The Scott Act.

THE CONVENTION DECIDES TO SUBMIT THE MEASURE IN GREY.

(From the Meaford Mirror.)

A Scott Act convention was held in the basement of the M. E. church, Meaford, on Friday night and Saturday morning.

Meaford sent 22 delegates; St. Vincent township 20; Thornbury, 4; Sydenham, 8; Owen Sound, Collingwood, tp., and Woodford, 2 each; Euphrasia, 1; Holland, 1; Durham and Flesherton, none.

The Rev. Mr. Washington, Meaford, presided.

Moved by Mr. Chas. Burns, seconded by the Rev. Mr. Perry, that this meeting deems it advisable to submit the Scott Act to the voters of this county.

The above resolution, which was the subject of animated discussion, was moved at the first session on Friday night, but was not voted on until Saturday when it was carried unanimously.

Intimations were made as follows: That Rev. Mr. Millard, of Wiarton, and Rev. Mr. Bosworth, of Collingwood, would assist the friends of the Scott Act to carry it in the County of Grey.

Motions were passed (1) fixing the time of voting on or about the 1st of October next; (2) to raise $1,000 for the expenses of the Campaign; (3) appointing (a) committee on finance, (b) on division of the county and organization, (c) on campaign literature; (4) making Meaford the headquarters; (5) and a county executive as follows: Mr. C. R. Sing, Chairman; Rev. Mr. Paterson, Chas. Burns and H. T. Law.

The finance committee reported the apportionment of money to be raised by each municipality,—making in all $1,000.

The comittee on devision of the county and organization reported in favor of dividing the county into four districts with headquarters as follows: 1. St. Vincent, Collingwood and Euphrasia, with headquarters at Meaford; 2. Derby, Sullivan, Keppel, Sarawak, Sydenham and Holland, with headquarters at Owen Sound; 3. Bentinck, Normanby, Glenelg and Egremont, with headquarters at Durham; Proton, Osprey and Artemesia, with headquarters at Flesherton.

A resolution was passed sending Messrs. C. R. Sing, and T. McKenny as a deligation to Durham and Flesherton (unrepresented) to assist in the work of organization.

The following were appointed conveners of meeting in the districts named: Meaford—Rev. Geo. Washington and F. Bole; Owen Sound—Rev. Mr. Howell and A. H. Finch; Flesherton—Dr. Christoe and the W. P. of the Sons of Temperance; Durham—Rev. Mr. Forrest and J. C. Dunlop.

The committee on literature reported recommending the renting of a committee room in Meaford, for the purpose of distributing campaign literature therefrom.

The above reports were all unanimously adopted.

Mr. Stephens announced that Mrs R. J. Doyle had subscribed $50 towards the expenses of the campaign, and a vote of thanks was passed to her.

The convetion then arose.

Stabbing Affray in Bruce.

WALKERTON, June 2.—Yesterday at Chepstow, near here, Henry McNabb, 20 years of age, was seriously stabbed by Frank Niemer, a youth recently from Germany, unable to speak English. Niemer quarrelled with one Fleming on whom he drew a knife. The blade glanced off Fleming's ribs just over the heart. McNabb interfered to make peace; he in turn was assaulted by Neimer who buried the knife in his body immediately under the ribs. Whilst the people were engaged in attending to McNabb, Niemer got away. McNabb is dangerously wounded. Niemer is a round faced, dark-complexioned, black eyed youth of 20, medium size, stout build.

INCENDIARISM.—Thursday night last between twelve and two o'clock no less than three attempts were made to fire the buildings occupied by two colored persons, one on Scrope-street and the other on Baker street. About 12 o'clock the fire alarm was rung, but it was impossible to find out by whom, and at the time it was thought to be a false alarm, as there were no signs of fire; but subsequently it became known that the house of Christopher Johnston had been on fire, and also the house of Wm. Jackson. The first attempt to fire Jackson's house was made just about the time the bell rang, by pouring coal oil at the back door, which was fired, but was discovered in good time and was extinguished. But the fire fiend not being satisfied returned in about two hours and made another unsuccessful attempt to set fire to the rear end of kitchen, by placing a burning lamp under the building. It is very unfortunate indeed that some one of these fiends could not be caught and made an example of.—O. S. Advertiser.

AN EASILY MADE CHILDS SUIT.—Some pretty little dresses can be made of the fine qualities of gingham or of seersucker that the children who do not look at least respectably dressed must be pitied, for they are without doubt neglected in other directions than clothing. A very simple way to make these for small children, from one and a half to five years, is to lay three broad pleats, sew them, and spread them out, then lay the pattern on for the back of the dress; a sack pattern or plain apron pattern will do for this. Cut it out and after securing the pleats firmly down as far as the bottom of the waist, rip out the stitches holding them below that, and let them fall loosly, in order to have the neceessary fullness to the skirt. The fronts may be plaited or may be perfectly plain with the exception of a strip down the front, upon which the buttons are sewed. It is very becoming if made double breasted, with two rows of buttons; put a strap across the back and a round collar on, and you have a pretty suit—N. Y. Post.

A Witness for the Defence.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER I.

It had been raining steadily all day. It was still raining as I stood at the corner of a great London thoroughfare on that wretched November night. The gutter babbled, the pavement glistened, humanity was obliterated by silk and alpaca; but the night-wind was cool and fresh to me, after a day spent in a hot police court, heavy with the steam of indigo-dyed constables, of damp criminals, and their frowsy friends and foes. I was later than usual. That was why I stood hesitating, and turning over and over the few shillings in my pocket, painfully gathered by a long day's labor as a young and struggling legal practictioner. I thought of my poor little sick wife, waiting so longingly for me in the dull lodgings miles away. I also considered the difficulty of earning two shillings, and the speed with which that sum disappeared when invested in cabs. I thought of the slowness and uncertainty of the 'bus, crowded inside and out; again of the anxious eyes watching the clock; and my mind was made up. I called a hansom from the rank just opposite to me, and jumped in, after giving my directions to so much of the driver as I could make out between his hat and his collar.

I felt tired, hungry, and depressed, so that I was glad to drop off to sleep, and forget weariness and worry for a little while; and I remained unconscious of bad pavement and rattling rain, blurred glass and misty lights, until the stoppage of the cab roused me. Thinking that I had arrived at my journey's end, and wondering why the glass was not raised, I smote lustily on the roof with my umbrella. But the voice of the driver came down to me through the trap in a confidential wheeze; and at the same time I saw that there was a great crowd ahead, and heard that there were shouts and confusion, and that my cab was one of a mass of vehicles all wedged together by some impassable obstacle.

"P'liceman says, sir," explained cabby, "as there's bin a gas main hexploded and blowed up the street, and nothin' can't get this way. There's bin a many pussons hinjured, sir. I'll have to go round the back streets."

"All right," I replied. "Go ahead, then."

Down slammed the trap; the cab was turned and manœuvred out of the press; and I soon found myself traversing a maze of those unknown by-ways, lined with frowsy lodging-houses and the dead walls of factories and warehouses, which hem in our main thoroughfares. I was broad awake now, excited by the news of the accident, speculating on its causes, and thinking of the scenes of agony and sorrow to which it had given rise, and of my own fortunate escape. The hansom I was in was an unusually well-appointed one for those days. It was clean and well cushioned; it had a mat on the floor instead of mouldy straw. Against one side was a metal match holder, with a roughened surface; bearing, as the occasional street lamps showed me, the words "Please strike a light. Do not injure the cab." On each side of the door was a small mirror, placed so as to face the driver; so that I could see reflected therein, through the windows, those parts of the street which the cab had just passed.

We careered up one dreary lane and down another, until, having just turned to the left into a rather wider thoroughfare, we were once more brought up. This time it was a heavy dray discharging goods at the back entrance of a warehouse. It was drawn up carelessly, occupying, in fact, more room than it should in that ill-lighted place. We were almost into it before we could pull up. To avoid accident, the cabman threw his horse half way across the road; and in this position proceeded gently but firmly to expostulate with the drayman after the manner of cabmen on such occasions. The surly fellow would take no notice, and made no attempt for some minutes to give us room. I was too listless to interfere, and lay back in the cab, leaving the driver to get over the difficulty as he might.

In the right-hand glass, owing to our slanting position across the road, I could see reflected, a few yards off, the corner of the street out of which we had just turned with the lamp which stood there, and above the lamp the name of the street, which, though reversewise on the mirror, I made out to be "Hauraki Street." The queer name attracted me; and I was wondering what colonial experience could have led the builder to select it, when I saw the reflected figure of a man come into the light of the lamp along the road in which we stood. He was young, but dishevelled and dirty, and evidently wet through. His clothes, bad as their condition was, looked somehow as if their wearer had been, or ought to be, in a better condition of body than his present one. He stared desolately about him for a while, as if to see whether there could be any other creature so miserable as to be lounging purposelessly about, without an umbrella, in such a place on such a night. A neighboring clock struck eight, and he seemed to turn his head and listen till the clangour ceased. Then he inspected the sleeves of his coat, as people always do when unduly damp, and drew one of them across his forehead, taking off his hat for the purpose, as though hot from exercise. Then he carefully produced from inside the sodden and melancholy hat a folded piece of paper and a clay pipe. He filled the pipe from the paper, restored the latter to the hat, and put the hat on his head. Then he looked helplessly at the pipe. I guessed that the poor wretch had neither a match nor a penny to buy one. A thought seemed to strike him. He looked up suddenly at the lamp, and I saw his face for the first time. I am an observer of faces. This one was peculiarly short and broad, with a projecting, sharp-pointed chin, a long slit of a mouth, turned down at the corners; as it was now half open in perplexity, it disclosed a conspicuous blank, caused by the loss of one or more front teeth. The eyes were small and dark, and half shut with a curious prying air. This was all I noticed; for now the man began awkwardly and laboriously to "swarm" the lamp-post; evidently with a view of getting a light for his pipe. Having got about half-way up to the top, he incautiously stopped to rest, and instantly slid to the bottom. Patiently he began all over again; and I now saw that if he was not altogether tipsy, he was something very like it. This time his efforts were so ill judged that he caved in the melancholy hat against the cross-bar of the lamp; and the last I of him as my picture vanished at the whisking round of the handsom, he was blindly waving his pipe at the lamp glass, his head buried in the wreck of his hat, as he vainly endeavoured to introduce the pipe through the opening underneath, and beginning one more to slide impotently down the shaft.

I got home without further adventure in time not to be missed by my little invalid; but for several days the queer street-name abode with me, as the merest trifles will haunt an over-anxious mind, such as mine then was. I repeated it to myself hundreds of times; I made it into a sort of idiotic refrain or chorus, with which I kept time to my own footsteps on my daily tramps. I tried to make rhymes to it, with indifferent success; and altogether it was some weeks before the tiresome phantom finally departed.

Also, I often wondered whether the drenched young man with the crushed hat had managed to get a light after all.

Twelve years had gone, and with them my troubles—such troubles at least as had been with me at the time of the beginning of this story. I was now a prosperous solicitor, with a huge and varied practice, and with a comfortable home on the northern heights of London, wherein to cherish the dear wife, no longer sick, who had been my loving companion through the years of scarcity. The firm's practice was a varied one; but personally I devoted myself to that branch of it in which I had begun my professional life—the criminal law. In this I had fairly won myself a name both as an advocate and a lawyer—often very different things—which tended to make me a richer man every day. And I am glad to be able to say that I had added to this reputation another yet more valuable—that of being an honourable and honest man.

Late one afternoon, as I sat in my office after a long day at the Central Criminal Court, making preparations for my homeward flight, a stranger was shown in to me. He sat down and began his story, to which I at first listened with professional attention and indifference. But I soon became a trifle more interested; for this, as it seemed, was a tale of long-deferred vengeance falling after the lapse of years upon the right head; such as we lawyers meet with more often in sensational novels—of which we are particularly fond—than in the course of practice.

Some dozen years ago, he said, there had lived in a remote suburb of London an elderly maiden lady, named Miss Harden, the only daughter of a retired merchant skipper, who had got together a very tolerable sum of money for a man of his class. Dying, he had left it all to his only living relative and friend, his daughter; and on the interest thereof she managed to live comfortably, and even to save quite a third of her income. These moneys she—being, like many maiden ladies, of a suspicious nature—always declined to invest in any way, but kept them in an oaken cupboard in her sitting-room, which cupboard she was accustomed to glorify for its impregnable nature, when the danger she ran by keeping so much money about the house was represented to her. Perhaps she was fortified in her obstinacy by the consideration that she was not entirely alone and unprotected, though most people thought that such protection as she had was worse than none. It consisted in the presence of an orphaned nephew, to whose mother, on her deathbed, Miss Harden had solemnly promised that she would never forsake the child. She had been as good as her word, and better—or worse; for she had treated the boy with such foolish indulgence that he had grown up as pretty a specimen of the blackguard as could be found in the neighborhood. After being expelled from school, he had never attempted to improve himself or earn his own living in any way, except by betting (and losing), and by making free with certain cash of his first and only employer; which questionable attempt at providing for himself would certainly have led to his being some time provided for by his country, but for the tears and prayers of his aunt, and the sacrifice of a round sum of her hoardings. From that time he lived with her, and she cherished and endured him as only women can. Scolding him when he came home tipsy at night, putting him carefully to bed and forgiving him the next morning, only to scold and put him to bed again the same evening; so with little difference, went on their lives for years.

But at last this loving patience began to wear out, and as the aunt got older and more irritable, the nephew's little ways caused louder and more frequent disagreements. One morning things came to a climax. She caught him actually trying to set free the imprisoned secrets of the impregnable cupboard with a pocket-knife. Being interrupted and violently abused—the old lady was very ready with her tongue—he turned round and struck her. She did then and there what she had threatened often of late; ordered him out of the house, and what was more, saw him out. There was rather a scene at the street-door, and the lookers-on heard him say, in answer to her vows that she would never see him again, "When you do see me again, you'll be sorry enough;" or words to that effect. The last time he was known to be in the neighborhood was about three o'clock that afternoon, in a public-house close by, which he used to haunt. He was then in a maudlin state, and was descanting to a mixed audience on his wrongs and on the meanness of his relative. He further produced the knife with which he had attempted the cupboard, and was foolish enough to say that "he wished he had tried it on the old woman herself, and he would too, before the day was out."

All this greatly amused his rough hearers, who supplied him well with liquor, and generally kept the game alive, until the landlord, becoming jealous of the reputation of his house, turned him out of doors. From that moment he disappeared; but the same night a horrible murder was committed. The aunt had sent her one servant out for half an hour. The girl left at a quarter to eight, and returned at a quarter past, to find the poor old maid lying dead on the floor, while the oak cupboard was open and empty. Screaming with horror, the girl called in help; and one among the crowd that filled the house before the police came picked up on the floor a knife, which he identified as the very one which the nephew, whom he knew well, had exhibited that afternoon at the public-house. He repeated this evidence at the subsequent inquest, and it was confirmed by many others who knew both the knife and its owner. A verdict of wilful murder was returned against the nephew, whom we will call John Harden, but who had disappeared completely and entirely. Inquiries, advertisements, and the minute description of him was posted, together with the offer of a heavy government reward for his apprehension, throughout the three kingdoms—all were useless. In the course of time the affair died out, except as an occasional remembrance in the minds of those who had been most intimately connected with it.

But on the afternoon of the very day on which the stranger waited upon me, John Harden had been recognized in the Strand by my informant. He wore a well-fitting suit of dark clothes, and was, in fact, the confidential servant of a retired Australian millionaire, who had come to England to spend the rest of his days there. On being addressed by his name, he at first appeared surprised, though in no way alarmed; but almost immediately admitted that he had formerly gone by that name, though he had for years borne another. His accuser straightway gave him into the custody of the nearest constable, charging him with the murder. Then indeed the unfortunate man showed the greatest horror and disturbance of mind, protesting that he did not even know his aunt was dead; that he had intended to go and see her as soon as he could be relieved from attendance on his master; that he had even written to her several times, but having received no reply, had concluded that she was determined to renounce him entirely. He was locked up at the station for the night, and was to be brought before the magistrate in the morning; and my informant's object in coming to me was to instruct me to prosecute, not being content to leave that duty to the police. He was, it seemed, the very man who had, as already stated, picked up the knife with which the murder was committed; and he expressed himself as being extremely anxious that justice should be done, and that the murderer should not escape. He stated that, though badly enough off twelve years ago, he had since succeeded in trade; that he knew the poor old lady well, having done many an odd job about the house for her; and that he was willing, for justice' sake, to put his hand as reasonably far into his pocket as could be expected. As he sat opposite to me, his face burning with indignation, I could not help thinking that it would be well for the country and lawyers if all citizens were as prompt as my new client to spend their means in exposing and punishing crime in which they had no individual interest. I said something to this effect, and my remarks were received with a proper pride, tempered by modesty. "He hoped he knowed his dooty as a man, and tried to do it."

It so happened that I was obliged to leave town next day, to attend to certain matters connected with an estate for which I was trustee, in another part of the country. I told him this, adding that the magistrate would certainly send the case for trial, and that I should be back in town in time for the next Old Bailey sessions, and I would be responsible that the case should receive proper attention in the meantime. He merely said that he left the matter in my hands, and that if I said it would be all right, he was content, and so departed, engaging to attend to have his evidence taken down the next morning. I went to the office of a brother practitioner on whom I knew I could rely, handed him my written instructions, requested him to take up the case and work it until my return, and then did what every business man should be able to do—wiped the subject altogether out of my mind for the present.

THE LARGEST CITY.

Something of the Government of the World's Biggest City.

A new scheme for what we should call a revised city charter for London is before Parliament and under public discussion. The present "city" corporation of London only covers the central part, a very limited area, and outside of that the city is governed by twenty three vestries, fifteen district boards and other commissions, making forty local administrative bodies to govern one city. It adopts the uni-cameral system of legislation; that is, it will have but one legislative body—a common council of 240, elected for three years by all voters throughout the city who would be entitled to vote under the general laws of municipal elections. Voters otherwise entitled, but non-resident, may preserve their right if they live within twenty-five miles. In this common council are charged all the authority possessed by the above-named forty boards. Each district will elect its own councilmen. Members are apportioned to districts on a double basis of population and valuation and the first election is to be held January 29, 1885. The lord mayor is to be chosen by the common council for a term of one year. But the aldermen of London,—time-honored office of vast dignity,—must go. The board will expire May 1, 1885, except that the present members will retain their functions as justices of the peace during life. The sheriff of London who is now elected by the city guilds will be elected annually by the common council, who will also elect a deputy mayor. The lord mayor must be approved by the Queen before taking office. There seems to be no provision whatever for the subject which troubles great American cities, namely, the executive appointments, and it is not very clear what the provisions are for filling the executive agencies of the city. There is, however, a singular device for a local board in each district called a district council, consisting of the councillors from that district ex officio and a body of district councillors, also chosen for three years. These sub-divided bodies will have no power to tax or appropriate, but they may spend money "allocated" or allotted to them by the central board. The Common Council is to choose coroners, who will have salaries. The schools remain under the control of the existing School Board. The troublesome question of licenses is all placed in the hands of the justices of the city until otherwise ordered by Parliament, and the police remain as now under the immediate control of the home secretary—that is, of the imperial government.

The first Londoner, according to the Builder, who introduced conduit water into his premises was a tradesman of Fleet-street. This is how a record of 1478 sets forth the occurrence: "A wax chandler in Fleet street had by crafte perced a pipe of the condit withynne the ground and so conveied the water into his selar; wherefore he was judged to ride through the citie with a condit uppon his hedde," the city crier meanwhile preceding the criminal and proclaiming his offense.

HORRIBLE MURDER IN NEW YORK.

A Husband Stabs his Wife to Death, and Then Attempts to Kill Himself.

Delia Ambrose of 88 East Third street, New York, called for her sister, Mrs. Mary Wolfe, at 212 East Twenty-sixth street, at 2½ o'clock, on a recent afternoon, and the two went out shopping. They spent an hour in the store, and then walked homeward with packages in their arms. They went up to Sixth avenue, and through Twenty-sixth street to Third avenue. They crossed Third avenue, and had just stepped upon the sidewalk at the southeast corner when a wild-looking man sprang at Miss Ambrose from behind and stabbed her twice, on the left side of the head and in the neck.

"John!" she exclaimed, as she staggered against a lamp-post, and at the same moment Mrs. Wolfe exclaimed, "My husband!"

As Mrs. Wolfe spoke the man seized her and stabbed her in the left temple. Mrs. Wolfe broke away from him and ran into Michael Sweeny's liquor store on the corner. Blood spurted from her wound over the flags and against the shop window. She entered the saloon by the front door and sat down upon a beer keg opposite the bar and midway between the front door and the side entrance on Twenty-sixth street.

The saloon keeper was behind the bar, and Patrick McDonough, a customer, leaned against it. They had heard the screams in the street, and as the woman staggered in, McDonough ran to the front door to see if any one was pursuing her. As he reached the door he saw the wild-looking man with a knife in his hand about coming in. McDonough slammed the door and turned the key in the lock.

The man was not to be kept out, however. He ran around to the Twenty-sixth street entrance. The figured plate glass door there was closed. The man struck it and shoved it with his shoulder. He stood in the doorway for a moment, glaring around, and then saw the woman cowering on the barrel. He rushed at her, seized her by the shoulder, and threw her violently to the floor. She did not cry out, and he did not say a word. Kneeling on one knee, he stabbed her three times, striking hard each time. Then he straightened up, glared menancingly at Sweeney, who still stood behind the bar, and then deliberately plunged the knife three times into his own abdomen, and without a cry fell across the woman's body, dropping the knife by her side.

Miss Ambrose had looked into the saloon and run out again just after the man had rushed in. She now came in with Policeman Murray. Mrs. Wolfe was dead. Her light-colored hair and her close-fitting black suit were wet with blood, as was the parcel she still held.

"That man," said Miss Ambrose, "is my sister's husband. His name is John Carpenter. He has just come from prison, where he was sent in 1878 for stabbing a woman whom he mistook for my sister in St. Francis Xavier's Church."

Two ambulances and the dead waggon were called. The body of Mrs. Wolfe was taken to the Morgue. Carpenter and Miss Ambrose were taken to Bellevue Hospital.

Mrs. Wolfe was a handsome woman. She was 33 years of age. There was a deep wound on her right temple, the right ear was severed, the subclavian artery in the right side was cut, and a wound on the left side of the neck, which caused instant death, cut through the jugular vein. The cuts were made with a crescent-shaped shoe knife.

Carpenter is 50 years old, about 5 feet 8 inches tall, with close-cut gray and black mixed hair, and clean shaven face. He has dull blue eyes, heavy square features, and the general build and expression of a bruiser.

"Yes," he said in a surly tone as he lay on a stretcher in Surgeon Moak's ward' "the woman I killed was my wife. I intended to kill her. I wanted her out of the way. I wanted to die myself, because I'm tired of living."

His wounds are serious. Miss Ambrose's cuts are painful, but not of a dangerous nature.

Variety in Ornamental Planting

There is no good reason for the lack of variety in trees, shrubs, and materials employed in making homes as attractive. Among the many kinds of trees, shrubs, and flowers hardy in nearly every part of this and which are now kept for sale in the nurseries, there is in the matter alone, for example, a wonderful difference among them. There is enough difference among their season of coming into bloom, one to make a selection, that would wealth of beauty every week in the from April to October, and for some longer at the South. Then the variety afforded by different forms, habits of such plants, the colors and the leaves, branches, and the of fruits of some, is very great, and their beauty and interest. The trees and shrubs must also be men the peculiar attractions they throughout the entire year. Then the hardy climbers—a most useful managed class of ornamental plant aquatic, bog, and rock-flowering ferns, all of which possess value in lines. Besides the hardy kinds, permanent value, there is an endless most of annual and perennial plants each year from seeds, bulbs, cuttings greenhouse or window-garden, easily grown, and which serve to garden gay for months in the summer characteristically bright flowers all these things are so easily and procured in the nursery and seed rents, that no one who has a plot surrounding the house should put any length of time, the setting out judicious assortment to amply embellish throughout the entire year. the surroundings of one's home will pay in dollars and cents, besides contributing to the enjoyment. The recently attended the appraisement of ornamental trees, twelve years planted had to come away on account of the widening of a street. The amount allowed as a remuneration for individual was as high as seventy-five dollars. The same trees when planted perhaps one dollar each, and the labor of only one-half as much more. It is worth for shade and ornament that the price. There are few places where presence or absence of fine trees and would not similarly effect their value sold. If there are children, judicious investments in beautifying the surroundings will afford invaluable returns in character in them a love for and an interest in objects; inspiring in them a desire for study of botany and natural science which nothing is more pure and elevating for young minds. There is much of the inclination of the young to leave homes for town life. Nothing would more potent to arrest this tendency to spend some money and time in making the home attractive by the means that have been suggested. Resolve to set about properly attend to a suitable selection of trees, shrubs, and flowers.

Country Dwellings and Grounds

Prof. W. J. Beal, of Michigan, in his horticultural report, says many things worthy to be remembered. He thinks the location of farm-houses are too near the road. In that many make a mistake in placing the barn across the road, in front of the house window, it may be. Have the garden and fruit garden as near the house as convenient. About one-tenth of the area of buildings should be set down for the improvement of grounds. Dispense with lanes and drives, except where they are needed for daily use. Study the matter well in time before locating the walks, but don't get started with little delay. It is a common notion to think that trees and flowers are the only ornaments of a place. A well kept lawn of fine grass is of the first importance in ornamenting a place. It is the foundation or the groundwork, and is fully equal in importance to trees and shrubs. Conceal wood piles and outbuildings with irregular groups of evergreens. A tree in the right place, will soon add more to the value of the farm, whether it be kept as a home or to sell for cash. Trees about the dwelling and the barns form shelter from winds; they add comfort and joy to man and beast; they economize the food of animals, they save fuel in the sitting-room; they afford shade in summer, and harbor birds; they afford shade in Summer. Beautiful trees will serve to constantly remind every one of the thoughtful and generous hand that planted them.

In locating trees there are a great many things to be considered. They should not be planted in straight rows, neither should they be planted at great distances from each other, except possibly along the roadside or along some fence. A lawn may be made unsightly and too much broken up by trees all over it.

Trees are very often planted too near the house, the owner not realizing that they are destined to grow upward and extend their long branches in every direction. It is seldom best to set a tree nearer than 40 feet of a house. Hundreds of cases can be pointed out where trees were planted much nearer the house than 40 feet. They shut out the view from the house, scatter leaves on the roof, cause shingles and spoil the water in the cistern, they kill the grass, keep paths damp, and overcrowd each other so the lower limbs soon become unsightly; they shut out the sunlight from the windows. After they have been planted and have made a good growth the owner has become attached to them, and hesitates to take them out; he tries to trim them up and leaves them, but they are not satisfactory, because they are not planted in the right place.

Do not set trees in circles, square, or in any other formal way. Do not plant trees so as to form grotesque shapes. If a small yard is spoiled by an old cherry tree or a large Norway Maple. Where the space does not exceed an acre, employ shrubbery, small kinds, and a very few single specimens of large kinds of trees. Avoid the Lombardy Poplar, it is short lived; the Mountain Ash is liable to borers, and such ever-greens as the Balsam Fir, which soon loses its lower branches. Do not plant too many evergreens; they will give a sombre look to the grounds. If you plant too few, the place looks naked in Winter.

For roadside planting in the West, Prof. Beal prefers the American Elm, Sugar Maple, Silver Maple, Norway Maple, Ash-leaved Maple, White Pine, and the

Where the space does not exceed half an acre, employ shrubbery, small kinds of trees, with a very few single specimens of large kinds of trees. Avoid the Lombardy Poplar, it is short lived; the Mountain Ash, it is subject to borers, and such evergreens as the Balsam Fir, which soon loses its lower branches. Do not plant too many evergreens; they will give a sombre look in Summer. If you plant too few, the place will look naked in Winter.

For roadside planting in the country, Prof. Beal prefers the American Elm, Sugar Maple, Silver Maple, Norway Maple, Sycamore Maple, White Pine, and the birches. But we should never select the Silver Maple or any of the birches for this purpose.

Shrubbery is especially suited to small places, and some shrubs should find room in all dooryards. It is a common mistake to scatter shrubs about the lawn, setting each one by itself. This cuts up the lawn too much, and the shrubs require more labor for their care. Mass your shrubbery where it can be cultivated and enriched together. Shrubs need shifting into new places or need the soil changed about them oftener than trees. Their roots do not spread so far or run so deep.

Roses require considerable care; in most cases they are neglected by busy people and present a sorry appearance.

Much may be done by way of exchanging plants, shrubs, and trees. Thus they bring up many pleasant associations every time we see them. In this way, also, one person stimulates his neighbors and friends, and may do much to improve the surrounding country and make it the admiration of all who pass that way.

GARDEN AND FARM.

Do not be in a hurry to plant; wait until the soil is in proper condition to receive the roots.

Experiment has shown that if a portion of the eye of potatoes is cut out or injured it causes the remainder to push forward more vigorously.

Now remember this, plant strawberries as soon in the spring as soon as you can get the ground ready. The earlier the better for next year's crop.

Never throw aside a variety of garden vegetable that you know to be good until there is a dead certainty that you have found something better.

Branches of trees broken off by heavy loads of snow or by winds should be cut back to the main branch and the wound covered with paint or melted grafting wax.

Engage the farm hands now for the year, and have steady employment for them. Do not let men be exposed in hard, cold rains, at the risk of a long sickness in the busiest time of the year.

Clean the poultry house and sprinkle with ashes or plaster. If lice abound, apply kerosene in small amounts to the perches, from which it will spread to the birds in effective quantities.

Hanging baskets are best watered by plunging them in a pail or tub of water until the ball of earth is well soaked. Allow the excess to drip, and when this ceases return the basket to its place.

Remove the surface water from the fields by trenches before the ground is deeply thawed, and avoid wasteful washing of gullies. See that the outlets of all drains are clear and working properly.

Get all the seeds ready, and purchase any implements that will be needed later in the season. Have all the machinery of the farm in prime working order, and be abreast of the rush of work as it comes.

Get ready for the onion crop. Onions go in the first of all the vegetables, and the oftener the seed-bed is stirred the better. Plenty of well-rooted manure, fine condition of soil, and good cultivation are essential.

A writer in the London Garden says he has discovered that grapevines in houses do better under rough rolled glass than under clear glass. The two most striking things he observed were the good quality of the fruit and especially its color, and the health of the foliage of the vines, which was less affected by red spiders than any he had ever known before.

People Who Never Eat Bread.

There are civilized nations a large proportion of whose peasantry eat little or no bread. Baked loaves of bread are unknown in many parts of South Austria and of Italy and throughout the agricultural districts of Roumania. In the villages of the Obersteiermark, not very many miles from Vienna, bread is never seen, the staple food of the people being sterz, a kind of porridge made from ground beech nuts, which is taken at breakfast with fresh or curdled milk, at dinner with broth or with fried lard, and with milk again for supper. This sterz is also known as heiden, and takes the place of bread ont only in the Steiermark, but in Carinthia and in many parts of the Tyrol. In the north of Italy the peasantry live chiefly on polenta, a porridge made of boiled maize. The polenta, however, is not allowed to granulate like Scotch porridge or like the Austrian sterz but is boiled into a solid pudding, which is cut up and portioned out with a string. It is eat n cold as often as hot, and as in every sense the Italian peasant's daily bread. The modern Roumanians are held by many scholars to be descended from a Roman colony, in other words, to be the cousins of the Italians; and, curiously enough, a variation of the polenta called mamaliga is the national dish of Roumania. The mamaliga is like the polenta in that it is made of boiled maize, but it is unlike the latter in one important respect, as the grains are not allowed to settle into a solid mass, but are kept distinct, after the fashion of oatmeal porridge.

Fashionable Shoes.

Progress says:—Fashion has seldom looked kindly upon patent leather shoes. Patent leather shoes have somehow never been thought quite the thing. And, moreover, they are not comfortable. The sun draws the leather, and then they clasp the foot unpleasantly close. But this summer they are going to make patent leather the mode if they can. Patent leathers are cheaper than they used to be. Now all grade shoes sell only about a dollar lower than patents. However, the patents do not last as well as calfskin, and they must not get wet. But they are easily cleaned. They do not have to be blackened; a rag with a little oil on it is all that is required. Patent leathers are only for gentlemen. Ladies never wear them. Why, I do not know, except it is that they have too much taste. But the shoe of all shoes for Summer for gentlemen is to be of seal skin. As for boots, there are hardly any made for regular wear, except for conservative old gentlemen who never change their habits. Thirty years ago it was all boots.

A woman will lug a pet dog around the streets all day in her arms and yet feel keenly the disgrace of being seen carrying her own baby. The female mind is past finding out.

Swords.

Barbarous and ancient swords are only curiosities, but it must be remembered that a sword cannot be fairly called ancient because it was in use thousands of years ago, while certain models invented in comparatively recent times are now curiosities of the rarest kind. The Roman broadsword could scarcely fall out of use when once invented, simply because it was an almost perfect weapon. Blades of the same shape are to be seen in the Assyrian bas-reliefs, and they have their descendants to-day in the Spanish "machete" and our sailor's cutlass. Sir Samuel Baker found a tribe of African Arabs using the straight heavy slashing sword of our mediæval men-at-arms to hunt the elephant. Hicks Pasha's soldiers and the garrison of Sinkat doubtless felt the weight of some of these swords. The carved scymitars in use among oriental nations have been worn from time immemorial.

On the other hand, we hear of particular forms invented by amateurs in the seventeenth century, which were soon given up in spite of great merits. Such a sword was the "colichemarde." This weapon was the invention of one of the extraordinary Swedish house of Konigsmark which produced the general who sacked Prague at the close of the Thirty Years' War, and after occupying a pretty conspicuous place in Europe for more than a century, ended with the gentleman who was murdered for intriguing with the wife of George I., and the lady who was the mother of Maurice of Saxony, and from whom George Sand descended. Probably the inventor of the colichemarde was the Count Konigsmark who figures in our own State trials as the murderer of Mr. Thynne, in the reign of Charles II. It was a triangular blade, very thick near the handle, and suddenly tapering to a very delicate rapier point. The colichemarde is said to have been an admirable weapon to fence with, and to have fallen out of use on account of its costliness and its supposed ugly look when sheathed. Judging from the descriptions it is possible to find a better reason for its unpopularity. The delicacy for which it was famous must have been more apparent than real, for it was gained by overweighing the "forte," that is the part of the blade near the handle, and therefore making it difficult to direct the point.

Jacob's Well.

The state of Jacob's Well is, doubtless, well known to the majority of our readers, even to those who have not themselves visited the Holy Land. It has again and again been described by the many writers on Palestine, and all have mentioned their disappointment that instead of finding any semblance to a well, or anything which could recall the interview of our Lord with the women of Samaria, they have merely found a dark irregular hole amid a mass of ruins in a vaulted chamber beneath the surface of the ground. I have shared this disappointment on many previous visits to Nablus, and again as, a fortnight ago, we stood beside the spot, it was with great regret that we were so utterly unable to picture before us the scene so graphically described by the Evangelist. We had clambered down into the vault, and were vainly attempting to peer into the dark hole amid the heaps of stone and rubbish when we chanced to see a few feet from the opening of the well, a dark crack between the stones. Fancying that possibly it might be another opening of the well, we removed some stones and earth, and soon were able to trace part of a carved aperture in a large slab of stone. Deeply interested at finding this, we cleared away more earth and stones, and soon distinguished the circular mouth of the well, though it was blocked by an immense mass of stone. Calling to two men who were looking on, with considerable labor, we at length managed to remove it, and the opening of the well was clear. It is impossibe to describe our feelings as we gazed down the open well, and sat on that ledge on which, doubtless the Saviour rested, and felt with our fingers the grooves in the stones caused by the ropes by which the pots were drawn up.

A Life's Romance.

How many romances are clad in the homeliest and even most repulsive guises! It is now discovered that a deaf and dumb knick-knack peddler, who for fourteen years attracted much attention on London Bridge, and who has just died in the poor-house, was a Swiss gentleman of fortune and belonged to one of the best families in the republic. Just before his death he called one of the hospital attendants to him, confessed that his deafness and dumbness had been feigned, and related his story. When a young man he was betrothed to a beautiful and accomplished girl. He had a violent temper, and in a quarrel one day over a trifle, so wounded the girl by the bitterness of his invective that she fell ill. The reproaches of his friends for his cruel conduct stung so that he became melancholy from remorse and left home. He then resolved to punish himself. He vowed to become a voluntary exile for twenty years, to earn his own living, leave his fortune untouched, keep his relatives and friends ignorant of his whereabouts, and go bareheaded and barefooted in all weathers during the entire time and to listen to no one and to speak to no human being during the last ten years of his exile. If he lived to complete his vow he meant to return home and use his fortune and the remainder of his days in making his betrothed happy, providing she were alive and unmarried, he rigidly kept his vow, but death cut short his programme. Investigation it is said fully substantiates the truth of his story, and his family in Switzerland have been notified.

Chinese Superstition.

As an illustration of the regardlessness of the Chinese for their female offspring, a child of tender years was observed to fall from a sampan into the river when no attempt whatever was made to effect its rescue. The infant, however, fortunately became entangled in the cordage of a broken spar, which, whilst drifting down the river, was picked up by the crew of another boat, and the child restored to her parents, who, as is customary, administered a sound flogging to the semi-drowned infant. The theory held by the natives is, that by preserving a fellow creature from a watery grave the rescuer is answerable in the next world for all the sins afterwards committed by the person rescued; which literally means that a wise dispensation of Providence has been frustrated.

Earthquakes and Luminous Paints.

The connection between earthquakes and luminous paint would hardly be apparent to any one without explanation. It nevertheless exists, and the recent earthquakes in our own country has served to remind us of its existence. As a matter of fact large consignments of the paint are sent to countries where earthquakes are prevalent. The use to which it is put invests it with the utmost importance just for the few critical moments of the shock. In the Phillippine Islands, where earthquakes are not uncommon, small metallic plates coated with luminous paint are so placed about the premises that at the first warning the inmates can quickly guided to the door, and thus to the street. In Manilla it is laid on in patches about the bedrooms and staircases, serving as guides for the doorhandles and the stairs, night lights being considered especially dangerous as likely to set fire to the falling house, and thus to roast the inmates in their own homes. It follows that those who live in districts likely to be visited by earthquakes will do well to adopt this plan, and to burn no flame lights at night, especially in the case of gas, the pipes for which might be broken asunder, and the gas escape and take fire. The gas should be turned off at the main nightly, and luminous labels be so placed as to indicate the door handles and other guides to the main point of egress, which would enable the residents to find their way out of their houses in the dark before the walls perchance buried them. It will be remembered that at Ischia there was just sufficient time between the first shock of the earthquake and the downfall of the Grand Hotel to permit those who acted promptly to save their lives.—Iron.

How He Saved a Bank.

"I saved a bank from bursting once myself," remarked a seedy-looking old chap as he laid down a morning paper, which he had perused second-handed. "I admit I ain't very wealthy now, but years ago, before my troubles came on me, I had large interests in manufacturing and banking. I was President of the bank in our town where there was a little panic and people made a run. I went in to see how they were getting along, just as the excitement began, when I found they couldn't stand it until the close of banking hours. The director wanted to suspend, but I objected. I told him to leave it to me. Happened it was pay-day at my shop. Hustled up there, put a flea in the engineer's ear, and in five minutes the engine broke down. The men were glad to get a holiday, but wanted their money. I told 'em we didn't have the currency ready, but would give 'em checks on the bank. My clerks made out the checks in a hurry, and weren't over-particular about losing any time figuring out odd cents. Well, my own two hundred and more men rushed for the bank and by the time the big depositors had heard of the run and had got round there was a big line in front of 'em. It took three hours to pay off my men with currency from my safe at the shop, which I carried in the back door of the bank. In that three hours we raised enough money to pay every dollar due our depositors, and the bank was saved."—[Chicago Herald] "Train Talk."

Roman Roads In England.

The four "great" Roman roads in England still run very much on the same lines as were laid down by the conquerors, but it is a popular error to believe that they were but four great roads. If we chose to put ourselves to some interesting trouble, we shall find that England and Wales are covered with a perfect network of Roman roads. The Watling street, the Icknield street, the Ermine street, and the Fosse Way were undoubtedly the Imperial roads to which most of the others were accessories; but the unlearned explorer is astonished to find Roman roads far away from any of the four, and of evident importance from the remains unearthed at different times on or near them. The famous Watling street is an instance of this. Most people know that its regular course, which is still a broad, well used high road, is from Dover or Richborough, through London, St. Albans, Towcester, Shrewsbury, and Chester to Carnarvon, and they do not look for it anywhere else. Yet the traveller hears it spoken of at Chelmsford and Colchester; he meets with it running through the Lake Country; he finds it almost in a straight line going to Whitby, via Huddersfield and York, and he is most of all astonished to meet it crossing the Roman wall in Northumberland on its way to Scotland. The Fosse Way and the Icknield street do not present such complications in the way of branches, but the Ermine street puzzles him much in the same way. Again, it is sometimes difficult for the explorer to say up on what Roman road a particular town stands, not from want of evidence as to any road at all, but from conflicting evidence. Thus, Winchester may stand upon any one of the five Roman roads which converge upon it respectively from Silchester, Salisbury, Southampton, Porchester, and Farnham. Again, the modern high road does not invariably stick close to that of Roman construction, which occasionally dwindles into a mere country lane, such as the Watling street between Dartford and Rochester, and the Ermine street between Caesbunt and Puckridge, while in other places it disappears altogether. The solution of all these difficulties, however, lends a zest to a task which need by no means be of a dry-as dust nature.

The Growth of the English Language.

The "English Dictionary on Historical Principles," undertaken over a quarter of a century ago, has just reached the point of the appearance of part 1, which carries it only to the termination of the suffix ant. There are 352 pages in the volume, and it embraces 8,365 separate words. The corresponding portion of Websters covers only fifty-six pages, and comprises only 3,550. It will be seen at a glance how rapidly we have been gaining in this respect—for while many of the words enumerated are such as Webster might have secured but did not, they are in much larger measure new inventions or new adaptations. Assuming that the other letters of the alphabet will maintain this ratio, the words contained in this new dictionary will reach the bewildering number of about 300,000, or fully one-third more than we have been accustomed to regard as the limit. And it is by no means certain that this book includes all the words that are fairly entitled to a place in such a work.

CRAZY AT TIMES.

Every Person a Lunatic Now and Then.

Prof. David Swing, of Chicago, says: The fact that a druggist of this city has ended a human life by putting up wrong medicine awakens much indignation. He says many customers were in the store; he was in a hurry; he put up morphine instead of some similar drug. The inquiry arises whether the clerk is able to fill an order only when he has no customers in the shop? How empty must the shop be in order to secure safety? Must the street in front of the drug store also be empty? What if a fire-engine goes by? What if a dog fight occurs while the druggist is reaching for quinine? Is he justified in taking down strychnia? What if his mother-in-law has come to visit him?

Such questions came up and properly; but there is another side to the fact of erring druggists, and that is, that most persons are crazy part of the time. The exceptions are rare. Each one is now and then a fool of the most complete order and species. All the laws and penalties in the world will not avail to make a druggist or anybody else have his full senses through all his life. Crazy moments or seconds will come. A wise man will step backwards off a porch or into a mud-puddle, a great philosopher will hunt for the specks that are in his hand or on his forehead, a hunter will sometimes shoot himself or his dog, a barber will sometimes forget his job and slice off a piece of a coin or an ear or the nose. A girl at work at Marshall Field's had been feeding a great clothing knife for ten years. Last week she watched the knife come down slowly upon her hand. Too late she woke up out of her stupor with one hand gone. For a few seconds her mind had failed and she sat by her machine a temporary lunatic and had watched the knife approach her own hand.

The man recently murdered on North Clark street of Chicago saw the enemy come up with murder on his face, saw him draw a revolver, and, instead of making a lightning spring at the man, he stood bewildered and thus fell dead. His reason left him in the second of his greatest need.

One of the distinguished professors in one of our colleges was teaching near a canal. Walking alone one evening in summer he walked as deliberately into the canal as he had been walking along the path a second before. He was brought to his senses by the water and mud and the absurdity of the situation. He had on a new suit of clothes and a new silk hat, but, though the damage was thus great, he still laughs over the adventure.

Our mail-collectors find in the iron boxes along the streets all sorts of papers and articles which have been put in by some hand from whose motions the mind has become detached for a second. A glove, a pair of spectacles, a deed, a mortgage, a theatre ticket, goes in and on goes the person holding on to the regular letter which should have been deposited. This is called absent-mindedness, but this is a brief lunacy. A lunatic is a person whose mind is habitually out of balance.

How Wooden Pipes are Made.

The short clay pipe formerly used by smokers has of late years been to a great extent supplanted by the wooden pipe, the manufacture of which is now an important industry. Some information respecting these pipes is given in British Consul Inglis's trade report on Leghorn, whence the material for making wooden pipes is now largely exported. Selected roots of the heath are collected on the hills of the Maremma, where the plants grow luxuriantly and attain a great size. When brought to the factory, the roots are cleared of earth, and any decayed parts are cut away. They are then shaped into blocks of various dimensions with a circular saw set in motion by a small steam engine. Great dexterity is necessary at this stage in cutting the wood to the best advantage, and it is only after a long apprenticeship that a workman is thoroughly efficient. The blocks are then placed in a vat and subjected to a gentle simmering for a space of twelve hours. During this process they acquire the rich yellowish-brown hue for which the best pipes are noted, and are then in a condition to receive the final turning; but this is done elsewhere. The rough blocks are packed in sacks containing from forty to one hundred dozen each, and sent abroad, principally to France (St. Cloud), where they are finished into the famous G. B. D., or "pipes de pruyers," known to smokers in England and the United States under the name of "Briarwood" pipes.

An Agreeable Royal Pair.

King Humbert is quite nervous in manner, and takes off his hat as though doubtful whether to toss it to the crowd, throw it on the floor of the carriage, or keep it on his head. I think the last would suit him best. He smiles, of course; that he must do, but such a smile! It is the mere turning up of the corners of the mouth, and seems to say: "Confound the mob! I'm tired, if I am a king, and shall not break my neck nodding." The queen is simplicity itself. Her manners, however, approach nearer my idea of queenliness than I ever expected to find. I see her often. She is always simply dressed, generally in black silk or satin, with sealskin sacque and sealskin broad-rimmed hat. She makes no display of jewellery. So far as dress goes, she is just like every other woman in comfortable circumstances. Indeed she makes no effort to be different. Her manner says plainly: "Circumstances have made me a Queen, but, after all, I am only a woman—no worse nor better than you."

A Mormon.

A Nova Scotia paper says: Halifax is excited over the presence in that city of a "real" Mormon. He is a nephew of the late Brigham Young, and a priest in the Church of the Latter Day Saints. His mission is to find some trace of his relatives, whom he believes to be residing in Nova Scotia, a grand-uncle having gone there from Massachusetts with the U. E. Loyalists. In an interview with a reporter of the Herald he stated that the population of Utah Territory at the taking of the last census was 143,963. This is made up as follows:—Mormons, 129,283; Apostate Mormons, 6,988; Josephite Mormons, 820; Gentiles, 14,156; and doubtful, 1,716. The native American Mormons number 99,969, the foreign born 43,994. The classification by sex is:—Males, 74,509; females, 69,454. The excess of the male population is explained by the fact that the greater portion of the non-Mormons is composed of unmarried men and minors.

MARKDALE JUNE. 5, 1884.

DEATH OF MR. JOHN MANAREY.

It becomes our painful duty this week to chronicle the death, under sad circumstances, of Mr. John Manarey, of the 9th con., Euphrasia. He was a strong, healthy, active man of 29 years when about three weeks previous to his death his mind suddenly became deranged in such a form as to render it necessary to put him under guard, and he was placed in Owen Sound jail, where he died two weeks later.

A coroners inquest was held on the body when a verdict of death, caused from "physical exhaustion produced by acute mania," was returned. He died on the 30th ult. and his body removed home.

THE FUNERAL

took place from his late residence on Sunday last to the Presbyterian cemetary, 9th con., Euphrasia, and was very largely attended. Rev. Mr. McLaren preached an impressive sermon and the funeral was conducted by the Orange body, of which he was a member. The Orange Young Britains of Meaford attended as a body, while every Orange Lodge in the district was represented.

The deceased leaves a wife and four children to mourn his premature demise, together with a large circle of friends. The sad event has cast a gloom over the whole community.

DISTRICT MEETING.

The Owen Sound District Meeting of the Methodist Church, met in Owen Sound, on Wednesday, 28th inst.; the Rev. D. C. McDowell in the chair. There was a full attendance of ministers and delegates. A large increase both in finances and membership was reported, and the district generally was found to be in a prosperous condition. The provisional district meeting was held on the following day. Rev. Mr. Edmunds, B. D., was elected secretary.

Two new missions were arranged for two married ministers, and two probationers were requested for Dundalk and Walter's Falls, if they can be obtained.

Rev. J. E. Howell, M. A., was elected to the Sabbath School committee; J. W. Armstrong, Esq., to the Missionary committee, and Rev. Wesley Casson to the Stationing committee of the Guelph Conference.

The following gentlemen in this immediate neighborhood were elected as lay delegates to the Conference:

Alfred Frost, J. W. Armstrong, H. D. Irwin, T. Hall, W. Cartwright and Robert Walker.

An interesting Sabbath School convention was held in connection with the meeting. Mr. W. A. Brown as delegate represented the Methodist schools on the Markdale circuit.

Kimberly.

From our own correspondent.

Mr. A. T. Buchanan left on Tuesday for Regina, N. W. T. He erected, recently, a very neat and comfortable residence in Kimberly where his family remain for the present time.

The people of this village have completed arrangements whereby the Post Office will shortly be removed to the village, Mr. Hammon, our store keeper, will likely be postmaster.

This will be a great convenience to all who get their mail matter at this office, as the office heretofore was about ¾ of a mile from the village.

The crops are now making rapid advancement. Fall wheat is below an average and spring wheat is poor on heavy soils while it is very good on light land, other grain is looking well while hay and fruit prospects are excellent.

We were told there was a fall of snow on the mountain last Friday morning, we do'nt have snow in summer time in Queen's Valley.

Euphrasia.

We had a very pleasant drive on Friday last to Rocklyn.

The council met that day as a Court of Revision in the town hall. There were numerous appeals, but the assessment roll did not suffer any very material change.

Mr. W. H. Dodson has erected a new hotel and stables since we visited the capital last. He keeps a good table, an attentive hostler, and appears to do a good business. We do not taste liquor, so leave that for others to judge.

Our respected friends, Reynolds Bros., are doing a fine business in general store keeping.

Mr. Wm. Martin, one of the pioneers of Euphrasia, died on Friday last, aged 84 years He was burried by the Orange body.

We were pleased to learn that the Markdale STANDARD has the largest circulation of any local paper at Rocklyn P. O. We are also gratified to know that the number is steadily increasing.

The township of Euphrasia is making the most general and vigorous improvements in buildings. fences, cultivation of the soil and general appearances of any township we have traversed.

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

The stables of the Anglo-American Hotel caught fire on Thursday last from a spark from a chimney. A very disastrous fire would have been the result had it not been discovered in time. As it was a large hole was burnt in the roof.

A cricket match between the upper town men and the lower town men on Monday last, resulted in a victory for the latter by three runs.

A tremendous hail storm passed over this place on Monday.

On Friday last the afternoon freight train ran off the track near the station. As the van went bumping over the ties, you should have seen the passengers (a number of commercial men, and the Inspector of Weights and Measures) leave that car. Truly they "did not tarry." You would have thought a menagerie of wild beasts was after them. Indeed there was a "Lyon" in the way.

A large crowd of excursionists are expected to take advantage of the cheap trip to Toronto on Friday next.

School matters quiet. It is quite possible, that the building of the new school will be postponed until next year.

One of our townsmen has been on a fishing excursion to Nottawasaga. One of his successes was the capture of a large sturgeon.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

Mr. M. Richardson is very much improving the appearance of his store which he now occupies by refitting and painting afresh the front, also that of his dwelling.

Mr. George Keefer has erected an artistic veranda in front of his dwelling which adds much to the appearance of the place.

The Teachers' Association of South Grey which held their annual meeting here, in the Town Hall last Thursday and Friday was fairly attended by teachers and others. On the evening of Thursday a concert was given in the Town Hall under the auspices of the association, and was in every respect a success. The audience was large and the programme select. Songs were given, each by the Misses. McDowell, Richardson, Damude, Christoe and Sproule, all of which were appreciated by the audience. Mr. J. R. Anderson, with his songs of Scotland, and which from him never sum to grow old, as usual highly delighted his audience, and was frequently enchored. Several duetts by Messrs. Vanzant and McDowell, and an instrumental by Mr. Rundle of Dundalk were listened to with very great pleasure. Miss Hopkins recited in her usual able manner. Mr. De Lamator, of Owen Sound, in his genial manner entertained the audience with a couple of recitations, and Mr. John Tait, of Collingwood, brought down the house with his recitations. His parody on the school boy reciting the "Charge of the Light Brigade", also "I've Nothing to Wear", and the "Brave Man." Mr. Tait, as a reciter, has few equals. Rev. Mr. McGregor gave a short speech. His remarks were well chosen. The programme was well carried out, and a very enjoyable evening was spent. Mr. M. Richardson occupied the chair in a very pleasing and interesting manner.

Personals.

Mrs. A. Speers and Miss. Dundass left for Manitoba last week.

Mr. Arch. Hill, of Stayner, is visiting his brother here.

Mr. Andrew Hill returned this week from visiting friends in Stayner.

Mr. R. Gordon, of Woodford, was in town this week.

Mr. T. Gilray, Reeve of Euphrasia, gave us a call last week.

Mr. John Hill, Painter, returned last week from visiting friends at Douglass., Ont.

Several mosquitoes were in town this week; also, a few potato bugs.

Fire in Priceville.

Shortly after one o'clock Sunday morning last fire was discovered in Watson's carrage and paint shop. Geo. Ferguson, whose parents live on the hill opposite the village, was the first to give the alarm, having seen the fire from his room. In a short time the majority of the citizens were on hand, but too late to save the building, which was speedily consumed, together with the blacksmith shop and warehouse adjoining which also belonged to Mr. Watson. Scarcely any thing was saved except the contents of the ware-house, such as the hearse, coffins, etc. Had it not been for the well aimed exertions of those present in saving Mr. Johnson's dwelling on the West, together with the fact of the wind shifting westward at the time, the post office, telegraph office and Crown hotel would certainly have been laid low by the devouring element, in fact that side of the street could scarcely have escaped throughout westward. Messrs. Watson's loss will amount to $2,000, partially insured in the Gore district their loss will be about $1,000 over the insurance. The origin of the fire is a mystery as the workmen are not smokers, and there has been no fire in the building for some time.

TO THE LADIES.

McGregor & Parke's Carbolic Cerate will cure any case of Pimples on the face or Rough Skin on either hands or face and leave them soft as silk. It will also heal any sore when all other preparations fail. Thousands have tested it. Ask your druggist for McGregor and Parke's Carbolic Cerate, and do not be persuaded to take anything else claimed to be as good. It is but 25 cents per box at Hill Bro's. J. & J. 3

Holland Council.

Council met as a Court of Revision. Members all present. Reeve in the chair. The following appeals were heard and dealt with:—

Jas. Dudgeon, too high on real estate, reduced $180; Jas. Adams, too high on real estate, reduced $100; Geo. IMPORTANT NOTICE

Having purchased the Grocery and Provision, together with the Wholesale Liquor business of J. E. Lauder & Co., I would respectfully intimate to the public generally that I have now opened a complete stock of fresh Groceries, Provisions, Crockery, canned fruits, together with a large stock of prime Liquors, all of which I will sell at close prices. Having been brought up to the trade, I feel confident that by close attention to business, and by studying the wants of my numerous customers our business relations will prove both satisfactory and profitable.

I have secured the services of W. J. Benson, who is well known and is thoroughly posted in the business, and our customers may rely on being waited on promptly. An early call respectfully solicited.

Mill owners who require repairs and those who purpose building a mill should consult Moffat Bros., Markdale. They are first-class practical machinists who thoroughly understand their business, and manufacture all kinds of mill work, such as steam engines, shaftings, etc., etc.

South Grey Agricultural Society.—We have received a copy of this society's prize list for 1884. It has been gotten up at the Review office, Durham, and is a credit to that establishment. The annual exhibition will be held on Sept. 30th and Oct. 1st, on their grounds in Durham.

R. J. Sproule's prints are all the rage. They are excellent value, fast and fashionable designs, and an endless variety to chose from. Remember the place, R. J. Sproule's, Flesherton.

We notice that Mr. T. Hall, of the Dundalk Herald, has been successful in the Ladies' Journal competition, having received an elegant silver tea service, of six pieces, valued at $110. It isn't every local editor that can sport a silver tea set, and if it was left to the profits of the trade very few could afford it.

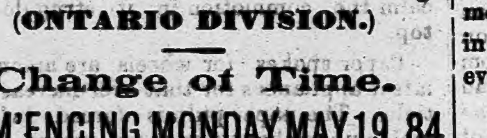
A team, with a load of pressed hay, took fright at the steamboat whistle in Meaford on Monday, the 26th May, just before the Wiarton excursion party left the wharf, and ran at a furious rate through the crowd, running over about a dozen, many of whom were more or less injured. Several were wounded but none fatally.

Kept them out.—Two men, not 1,000 miles from Markdale were planting potatoes this week, they had seed in a barrel, and were afraid the cows on the road would enter the gateway, which was open, and demolish the contents of the barrel, so they set the barrel in the gateway and kept them out. It is needless to say the cows had a feed of potatoes.

Smoke.—On Tuesday morning about 3 o'clock the inmates of the Revere hotel were awakened by a dense smoke and on rushing down stairs fire was discovered in the partition between the bar and dining room, it was soon however got under control. The fire appears to have originated in two places in the cellar and looks like the work of a would-be incendiary. The damage was trifling.

Late Mr. Donald McArthur.—On Sunday, 1st June, the last sad rites were paid to the remains of Mr. Donald McArthur of Euphrasia who died in the hospital, Toronto, on Saturday last, aged 74 years. The funeral was largely attended, Rev. Mr. McLaren conducting the services. Mr. Mc. was one of the early settlers of the township, having over 30 years a resident, and was highly respected as far as known for his cheerful disposition, scrupulous honesty, and a charitable christian spirit. His remains were deposited in the Presbyterian Cemetery, 9th line Euphrasia.

Lost or stolen.—A black curly ... tail dog from the Revere hotel on Wednesday the 28th May. Any party returning him will be suitably rewarded.



The first Excursion of the season will be run to Toronto, on Tuesday the 17th inst., under the auspices of the Presbyterian Sabbath School. Train leaves Markdale at 6:26 a. m. returning leaves Toronto at 5, p. m. return tickets 1.25, children 60 cts. For further particulars see posters, etc.

We would draw the attention of all lovers of sport to the grand fishing match on Friday, 15th inst. All chosen will be sure to meet at the Revere Hotel at 7 a.m. Chosen or not all are cordially invited and a jolly time can certainly be expected. Supper in the evening at the same popular hotel.—Com.

Our enterprising townsman Mr. D. J. Shanahan, of the Markdale Carriage Works is doing an extensive trade this season. His rigs are going out as fast as manufactured; he finished up and sold new rigs to the amount fo $1,100.00 in May, and this month will equal if not surpass that amount.

SUNDAY'S DINNER.

w it is Managed in the Slums of London.

Sunday's dinner! We know what that means here at the West, among the rich and the well to do. But among the poor, the very poor, whose modest wages is at the utmost twelve or fourteen shillings a week, the toiling helots who live in one room in the slums—do you know what sort of a feast their Sunday's dinner is?

The Sunday's dinner of many of these people consists, alas, of no dinner at all. But there are thousands of men who, by hook or by crook, will on this one day of the week have a little meal that does not wholly consist of bread and butter.

Of course, if they are going to have meat or fish, the first thing is to get it. Even the hare, as worthy Mrs. Glasse reminded her readers, had to be caught first. Now, there are many reasons why the poor do not shop on Saturday night. In the first place, many of them are employed themselves till the last moment in the streets, either selling their own stock, or assisting a wealthier neighbor. The men who get their poor wage on the Saturday, too, do not as a rule come home early with it. When they do, there are other things besides marketing to be thought of. If possible, a few trifling articles are redeemed from the pawnbroker; and then there is generally a visit to the publichouse, entailed by the necessity of paying up the week's score, and starting a fresh one. It is not perhaps generally known that the local publicans often trust the folk who live in their neighborhood for drink from Monday till Saturday, and find that it pays to do so. In the publichouses perhaps more of Saturday evening is spent than is good for either pocket or health. But apart from these things there is one great reason why the very poor leave buying Sunday's dinner until Sunday morning.

On Saturday the aristocracy of the working classes pick and choose, and pay the best prices for the privilege. On Sunday what is left is

SOLD AT A CONSIDERABLE REDUCTION.

It must be got rid of before one o'clock on Sunday—this perishable stock. The vendor's necessity is the vendee's opportunity. In the great Sunday markets of the New Cut, the Seven Dials, Brick-lane, Spitalfields, and East street, Walworth, business is in full swing from nine A. M. until one. There the poor housewife, with just the remnants of the week's earnings to spend, can get fish and meat and vegetables at an "alarming sacrifice." Decent mutton fetches from 7d. to 8½d. per lb. Beef from 8d. to 9d. Inferior and doubtful stuff can be obtained for considerably less; but the poor are generally experts in the matter of quality. They handle and examine fish and meat before they buy in a manner which would shock the stately fishmongers and butchers who have the Royal Arms over their shop doors. The criticisms passed on the food offered is sometimes distinctly slanderous, and it is couched in language that scarcely harmonises with the Sabbath bells chiming from the neighboring steeples, and calling the faithful unto prayer.

When the haggling and bargaining are over, and one by one the stalls wheel off, then the Sunday dinner question has assumed a new phase. It has to be cooked. Those who are lucky enough to be in time for the bakehouses bear their precious burden there. Those who cannot afford the expense, or who have not enough to send to the shop, do the best they can at home; and here the terrible deficiency of all inducements to thrift and cleanliness in the homes of the poor becomes painfully apparent. Ovens, boilers, coppers, there are none, and various are the devices resorted to to cook Sunday's dinner. An old battered gridiron is routed out or borrowed—sometimes a dilapidated frying pan does duty, but the "chet" has a difficult task at best. I have seen Sunday's dinner cooked on the end of a bit of stick at the fire by mother, while the eldest boy caught the gravy in a saucer. Father does not as a rule take part in the culinary rites. He is out or waiting for the public to open, and passing the interval in discussing whatever may be the objects of mutual interest with his neighbors.

Sometimes even when the dinner has been cooked there is a slip 'twixt dish and lip. Father has been known to come in the worse for liquor at two o'clock, and because dinner is not ready seize the "joint" and throw it at mother. Sometimes when the dish returns from the bakehouse, Billy, the eldest boy, is observed to be holding his head high as he bears it along. It is not wicked pride at the size of the beef, or the number of the potatoes that causes Billy's loftiness. Alas, no! The family, with one nose, discovers the bitter truth in a moment. Perhaps father has been to market instead of mother, and his lack of experience has been traded upon. The meat that looked so well is unfit for consumption.

These are dark sides, however, to Sunday's dinner; there is a brighter, and it is one which had I space I could exemplify with many a true and touching story. Often and often these wretched one-room family dinner parties are brightened by the presence of a guest—some poor creature worse off than the family, who is invited to share the little that there is. The little boy and girl upstairs, whose mother is in the hospital are asked, perhaps; or the poor old chap with the rheumatics, whose daughter, in service, has forgotten to send the promised half crown, and who is dinnerless and fireless.

THE POOR HELP THE POOR

with a thriftless generosity that is marvellous. I will be bound that you shall go down the meanest slum on any Sunday you like and you shall find half a dozen instances of the poor little Sunday's dinner—the oasis of meat in the wilderness of potatoes—being shared with some forlorn and shipwrecked brother or sister, who has reached even a lower depth of poverty than the host or hostess. There are in some great tenements children who but for this generosity would lie in the cold garrets and cry and hunger from Saturday till Monday, because the bread winner was in prison. It is no uncommon thing, alas! for father or mother to get drunk on Saturday, and fight, and have Sunday's dinner provided at the expense of the country, while the innocent little ones at home starve.

But our business is with those who do have dinner. Let us return to them. After the meal is over sometimes Johnny and Mary who go to the Board School, and can read, entertain their parents with a little light literature. Where the Sunday paper is beyond the humble means of the menage, the bit of paper in which the fish or the meat was wrapped is resorted to. Johnny spells the hard words out and gradually masters his subject and begins. Oh, the joy of the family if the torn half sheet contains a murder or a battle. Oh, the long faces that they pull if after Johnny has struggled with words he never met with before, it is discovered that "the readin'" is all about the price of American rails, or a fragment of a parliamentary debate. But it must not be imagined that in these poor families the Sunday afternoon is given up to purely intellectual diversions. Often when dinner is done. Mother and the girls have to be off with the "watercresses," and the boys go out with oranges, and father does his duty in that station of life into which he has been called, with a basket of periwinkles and shrimps. The "cresses," purchased at six in the morning in the market, are taken from under the bed; and washed in such water as can be obtained, the oranges and the winkles are shouldered, and off go the family to try and earn enough to pay the rent to-morrow and buy more stock to go on with.

The aristocracy of the working classes have a Sunday dinner that is a feast of Lucullus by the side of the poor little repasts I have tried to sketch. The wild struggle for the Sunday meal, the shifts, the disappointments and the disasters attending it, only the very poor—those earning precarious livelihoods—know. But—and here the great law of compensation comes in—with all the troubles and all the shifts, and pinching, and struggle, and disappointment, I question if on the day of rest, when rich folks sit at groaning tables, and well-to-do families gather together to eat, drink, and be decorously merry, there are any of them who so thoroughly enjoy the "Sunday's dinner" as the one-roomed feasters in the melancholy slums of London.

SCIENTIFIC.

The addition of a small quantity of carbolic acid or oil of cloves while making flour paste will prevent its becoming sour.

The composition of bell-metal varies; it is generally about eight per cent. copper and twenty tin. Small quantities of silver are sometimes added.

A patent for casting oil upon the troubled waters has been issued. By this machine, oil is forced through the pipes under the water surface, and rising quickly seems to calm the commotion in it struggle to the top.

Paper spokes for wheels are among the latest appliances for that ever-increasing article. The paper pulp is forced into iron molds under heavy pressure, where it dries and hardens; and the spokes thus produced are said to be much superior to wood. Paper is fast supplanting wood in many useful ways.

It is said that waterproof paper and pasteboard can be produced by treating the surface of ordinary paper with an ammoniacal solution of copper, so as partially to dissolve the surface, which is then let dry. Paper thus prepared is said to be equal in strength to parchment.

A test has been made at St. Louis of using fire brick for paving purposes. The test was made in the busiest streets. A committee of engineers and others have just reported that "fire bricks show all the endurance of granite, and that they make a smoother, cleaner, and less noisy street, and are more easily repaired and give a better foothold to horses; that neither frost nor fire affects them, and that they can be used at less than half the cost of granite."

A human skull, singularly like the famous Neanderthal skull which so engrossed the attention of archæologists and ethnologists a few years ago, has recently been exhumed from a clay deposit near Podbaba, in the neighborhood of Prague, Bohemia. It is notable for the great flatness of the forehead, the thickened eyebrows, and a remarkably small facile angle, apparently surpassing in this last respect the skull above mentioned. A mammoth's tusk was obtained from the same locality.

Bird-lime is made by boiling the middle bark of the holly seven or eight hours in water; drain it and lay it in heaps in the ground, covered with stones, for two or three weeks, till reduced to a mucilage. Beat this in a mortar, wash it in rainwater, and knead until free from extraneous matter. Put it into earthern pots, and in four or five days it will be fit for use. An inferior kind is made by boiling linseed oil for some hours, until it becomes a viscid mass.

With respect to waters for steam-raising, Mr. W. Ivison Macadam says—"No attempt should be made to soften water or employ anti-incrustators without first making a searching inquiry as to the nature of the waters available and the scale they may form. No special law can be laid down for the softening of water or the use of anti-incrustators; the cause of the disease must first be learned, and then the remedy must be safe and sure. To limit the materials used by laying down a hard-and-fast law would be to cause injury and loss to the steam user. The best results are obtained by the employment of a man of skill and the rigid working out of his suggestions."

Singular Dispute

The Russian papers are discussing a rather singular dispute which has arisen between an eminent medical professor and the relatives of a deceased gentleman residing at Kien. It is narrated that, about ten years ago the individual in question, whose head differed in shape from most people's heads, sold it to a doctor, who was anxious to examine it after its owner's death, for a stipulated sum. The gentleman was at that period struggling with poverty; his health was not robust; and his praiseworthy object in disposing of his head previous to his decease was that a sufficient sum of money might be left to his family with which to pay the expenses of his funeral. He has just died at Kien; but since the bargain was concluded, placed on paper, and duly attested by witnesses, he had grown rich, so that his relatives had no need of the small sum for which he made over his head to the doctor. They are consequently naturally anxious to avoid fulfilling the contract; but the Professor will listen to no compromise and insists on having the bargain carried out. He has been offered compensation and rejects it; the family decline to admit his rights, so the dispute is to be brought before the law courts, and pending the hearing of the case, the defunct gentleman has been interred with his head on his shoulders.

Out of a total area of nearly 21,000,000 acres the woods and copses of Ireland are now less than 330,000 acres. In Great Britain out of nearly 57,000,000 acres 2,500,000 acres are now thus returned. The forests of Europe are estimated to cover 500,000,000 acres, or nearly 20 per cent. of the surface of the Continent.

In the palace of Fountainebleau, that great rambling edifice of the style of the Renaissance, the apartments of the First Napoleon, next the gallery of Francis I., are still pointed out. His bedchamber remains exactly as he left it; and in his official cabinet a small round table is shown as that on which his hand signed away its last nominal fragment of power.

It is reported that there is an agreement to the effect that Fred Archer, the first of English jockeys, shall give his services to Mr. Manton after the claims of the Duke of Portland, Lord Hastings, and the Duke of Westminister. The term of agreement extends over three years, and has been bound by payment beforehand of a check for, it is said, £6,000.

Mme. Auban Moet, wife of the great champagne producer, has left her husband, her personality, amounting to the enormous sum of $12,000,000, with the extraordinary condition that should he refuse it the money is to go to young Prince Victor Napoleon. Mr. Moet preferred keeping the money. The profits of champagne making must be satisfactory.

Midhat Pasha, recently Grand Vizier, was a man of European education, whose acquaintance with Occidental customs led him him to grant many civil rights to the Christains of the Turkish Empire, but history will never find out to what extent he was implicated in the assassination of his sovereign the Sultan Abdul-Aziz.

A new outdoor game for ladies and gentlemen, called enchantment, is becoming fashionable in England. It is played with small light hoops, thrown with wands, something after the manner of grace hoops, though the wand is of a novel construction, involving a peculiar method of casting the hoop. A moderately large piece of ground is suitable.

A famous mollah at Cabul having declared the the use of tobacco to be contrary to the Mohammedan law, the Ameers have submitted the question to a counsel of mollahs from all parts of the country. If their decision be against the indulgence in tobacco, its use in Afghanistan will be prohibited, but if they pronounce it lawful the anti-tobacco prophet is promised imprisonment at Candahar.

There seems to be a good deal of difference between the authorities in England as to how much a "smokable" cigar costs. Sir Henry Wolff told the House of Commons the other night that "decent" cigars might be had for 9s. 6d. per hundred—that is to say, for a little more than two cents a piece. The London Times, on the other hand, assures its readers that a "fair" cigar can be had for ninepence or a shilling—equal to twenty-four cents.

A woman or man who treats a child cruelly in Japan is an object of universal horror. Coal-women will not accept employment there unless they can bring the little ones where they work with them on their backs. It is the same with factory women. It is funny to see the mothers in the fan manufactory at Osato, with a pair of sharp, merry observant, and oblique little eyes peering over their shoulders, and while they work they are constantly turning round to chirrup at the young ones and talk to them.

The hero of the hour at Berlin at present is Dr. Koteh, the President of the German Cholera Commission, who has just returned from India, where he has discovered the cholera germ. He studied medicine at Gottingen, and afterwards pursued his microscopic studies of bacteria at Breslau under Prof. Cohn. Dr. Koch has been known to the scientific world for some time as a conscientious and accurate observer, but to the non-scientific world his name was unknown until his discovery of the cholera germ.

The late great conductor, Sir Michael Costa, had wonderful rapidity of eye, ear, and glance. He had a habit of listening to the musicians likely to go wrong, and they never escaped him. On one occasion, when the swan in "Lohengrin" failed to make its appearance at the right moment, he called out, "Where's that goose?" At another time, in "William Tell," when a storm, accompanied by the usual atmospheric disturbances, ought to have come and did not, "Where's the thunder?" roared Costa. "Gone to dinner," was the answer.

The late Judah P. Benjamin is authoritatively stated to have made $75,000 a year at the English bar for some years. When he first commenced practice there he undertook jury cases, but in the difficult arts of cross-examination and addressing London juries, which require a special faculty, he did not shine. So he restricted himself to the equity side, to the courts in banc and courts of appeal. Still later he refused to go into any Court but the House of Lords and Privy Council, except for a fee of $500, and a client having demanded a consultation at his own house, the fee was $1,500. His favorite tribunal was the Privy Council, and his most eminent faculty argumentative statement.

The celebrated brigand Zuffa of Castel Guelfo, Bologna, died recently in the State prison of Ancona, where he had been confined the last twenty-eight years. He was sentenced for life in 1856 for many crimes. He was one of the most daring companions of Passatore, the terror of the Romagna forty years ago. Among the exploits by which Zuffa and his companions made themselves notorious was the following: One night they entered the city of Forlimpopoli while a performance was going on at the theatre. They went behind the scenes, and, levelling their carbines at the audience, announced that every door was closed and guarded by a brigand, and that the audience had better give up at once all their valuables. One of the gang went round with a bag collecting jewels and money, and the band then leisurely retired.

The fact that photographic portraits are so rarely good likenesses is attributed by a writer in Chambers's Journal to the circumstance that by photography it has hitherto been found impossible to give colors their true shade value. What is meant by this is that yellow to the eye is a brilliant light tint, but in a photograph it is reproduced almost black; red, instead of giving the idea of fire and light comes out black, and blue photographs perfectly white; such changes, of course, playing sad havoc with complexions and contrasts of color generally. According to a recent French process, however, the trouble or drawback in question can be obviated, the plan consisting simply in the addition to the usual ingredients of the sensative photographic surface of one per cent of eosine. A modification of the crystoleum process is not being introduced. The photograph, printed in the usual manner on paper, is first of all immersed in a mixture of naphtha, paraffine, mastic drops, ether, and vinegar; this treatment makes it quite transparent, so that body colors, in oil if laid broadly on their places on the back, of picture the show through with good effect.

A Locomotive Eight Inches Long.

Mr. Henry Case, of Oil City, Pa., who recently moved to Gloversville, N. Y., has just completed the smallest locomotive ever made, it being but eight inches long and weighing but a pound and a half. Three years, counting ten hours as a day's labor, have been devoted to its construction. There are 585 screws in the engine. The steam gauge is but one-fourth of an inch in diameter; the pump throws but one drop of water every stroke; the check valves in the pump are one-sixteenth of an inch in diameter; the headlight is only half an inch in width, seven eighths of an inch high, and three eighths of an inch long. The space in the lamp is so small that it was almost impossible to get enough oxygen in it to support the combustion. The fire is kindled by using a gill of alcohol, which runs the engine for half an hour. The stroke of the cylinder is one inch, bore five-sixteenths; the heater pipe is only the thirty-second part of an inch in diameter. There are seven flues in the boiler. The width of the track is one and five-eighths inches, and it makes four and three-quarters inches distance each revolution. The valve seat is but one sixty-fourth of an inch wide. The driving wheels are one and one-half inches in diameter; the front truck wheels one-half inch, and those of the tender are the same size. The tender is but three and three-quarters inches long, two and one-eighth inches wide, and two inches high. The metals used in its construction are brass, solid silver, gold, and steel.—New York Post.

Playing Chess Blindfold.

There is nothing very remarkable in playing a game of chess without seeing the board. When once mastered, the trick is not only fairly easy of performance, but the fact that the process is purely mental rather facilitates than impedes the action of the mind. To the blindfolded chess-player, there is present a mental picture of the board with the pieces in position. He can change the position of the men as easily as he can think, and after he has once mastered the difficulty of fixing the mental picture, it is distinctly before him. Some players, who do not in their common process of memory use picture phantoms, work out the moves as algebraical propositions are occasionally worked, by phantoms of sound; but, as a rule, chess players are mental-picture-readers, and can at pleasure call up any one of several pictures of boards as they last conceived them. The most difficult feat, and one which very few mental chess-players can accomplish, is to play two or three games simultaneously, the moves made by their opponents being told them in close sequence and their own moves being directed after all the reports of the proceedings of their opponents have been received. Thus, if there be several players against the one mental player, he must be told and remember what each of his adversaries has done before he begins to give the instructions for his several counter moves. In this exploit the most perfect development of the mental faculty of distinct picturing and the displacement and recall of mental pictures at will is exhibited. The prodigious difficulty of the feat can only be realized in the attempt to perform it. Even the expert blind-folded chess-player can rarely succeed in accomplishing the performance we have attempted to describe.

Sawing the Feet of a Corpse to Make It Fit the Coffin.

There is great excitement in Oak Creek, near Milwaukee, over the action of relatives of Horace Baldwin in sawing off his legs after his death last week to make them fit the coffin. Baldwin was 6 feet 7 inches tall, and when the day for his funeral had come it was found that his body was too long for the coffin. While his nephew was sawing off his feet with a common saw he thought the body moved, and he fell in a dead faint. Another relative finished cutting off the limbs. After the funeral it was thought that the nephew would be mobbed by the neighbors.

They Were Superfluous.

"Why do you always wear a bunch of flowers in your buttonhole?" inquired Miss Fussanfeather, while Mr. Titepants was calling the other evening.

"Oh, it gives one an air of freshness," responded the poetical young man.

"Well," replied the young lady, frankly, "I don't think you need any artificial means to prove your freshness."

And then Titepants went out and sat on the hitching-post to think it over.

Night Life of Young Men.

One night often destroys a whole life. The leakage of the night keeps the day empty. Night is sin's harvest time. More crime and sin is committed in one night than in the days of the week. This is more emphatically true of the city than of the country. The street lamps, like a file of soldiers with torch in hand, stretch away in long lines on either sidewalk; the gay saloons transparenaies are ablaze with attractions, the saloons and billiard halls are brilliantly illuminated; music sends forth its enticements; the gay company begins to gather; the haunts and houses of pleasure; the gambling places are ablaze with palatial splendor; the theatres are wide open; the whole of destruction are grinding health, happiness, hope, out of thousands of lives.

The city under the gaslight is not the same as under God's sunlight. The allurements and perils and pitfalls of night are a hundredfold deeper and darker and more destructive. Night life in our cities is a dark problem, whose depths and sins make us start back with horror. All heaven tears are falling, blood is streaming.

Young men, tell me how and where you spend your evenings, and I will write out the chart of your character and final destiny, with blanks to insert your names. It seems to me an appropriate text would be, "Watchman what of the night?" Policeman, pacing the beat, what of the night? What are the young men of the city doing at night? Where they spend their evenings? Who are their associates? What are their habits? Where do they go in, and what time do they come out? Policeman, would the night life of young men commend them to their employers? Would it be to their credit?

Make a record of the nights of one week. Put in the morning papers the names of the young men, their habits and haunts that are on the streets for sinful pleasure. Would there not be shame and confusion? Some would not dare to go to their place of business, some would leave the city, some would commit suicide. Remember, young men, that in the retina of the All-seeing eye there is nothing hid but shall be revealed in the last day.

Bismarck's Political Enemies

The Berlin correspondent of the Post gives an account of Bismarck's return to Berlin after the Lasker incident. "The chancellor," he writes, "hates his good city of Berlin, and never goes there unless he is compelled to. As public opinion was very busy with Lasker's death, and as the American press had sustained the action of the American congress in the matter, it became necessary for the chancellor to explain his position to the reichstag. He did so in the gentlest manner, trying not to tread on the tail of anybody's coat and paying a number of delicate compliments to the United States, the liberal party, and even, to the memory of Lasker, to whom he concedes everything but greatness. What he reserves for himself. Lasker has been more talked about since his death than he ever was in his lifetime. That is because behind the dead Lasker there is the living Bamberger and the dangerously eloquent Richter, besides Marcel and Virchard, to measure swords with, not to mention the chief of the new liberal parts, the Count de Stauffenberg. The chancellor sees that his enemies are dangerous and armed to the teeth; hence his bloodeyed words and soothing speech and the floral tribute on poor Lasker's coffin.

"Bamberger's speech at Lasker's grave," adds the correspondent, "was exactly like that of Antony over Cæsar's body. 'He was my friend, was true to me and just; but Brutus says he was ambitious—and Brutus is an honorable man.' Brutus on this occasion was Bismarck, and when Bamberger said 'Though the political world is keen enough it allows itself to be led by certain men whose capacity, foresight, and shrewdness makes them useful, but who, beneath the surface, are not always free from that personal bitterness which makes them see the evil side of things,' everybody knew what he had in mind, and I expected to hear the citizens cry out. 'The will! the will! Read us Cæsar's will!'"

The Great Napoleon's Tomb.

The end of my sight-seeing of Napoleon was reached when I entered the golden domed Invalides through the high-roofed chapel where dozens of shot stained and shell-torn banners—each a history in itself—tell more eloquently than words of the glorious victories of the dead Emperor in Italy, in Austria, in Prussia,—in all Europe, in fact. Beneath these old war flags the crippled, battered soldier from the adjoining hospital kneels before a golden Madonna and reverently crosses his palsied hands. Wearily leaning over the marble wall and looking long and earnestly at the massive porphyry mausoleum illuminated by golden and crimson and yellow-hued rays of sunlight, that shine through the stained glass windows of the mighty rook covering a few specks of dust and scattered pieces of withered bouquets all that is left on earth of Napoleon Bonaparte!

A Remarkable Incident.

A remarkable accident happened in New York recently. A safe weighing two tons and a half was being hoisted to the fourth floor of a building on Broadway, and had reached the desired height when a workman at the window through which it was to pass, and who had been guiding the ponderous mass suddenly gave a piercing and agonizing shriek that startled the crowd who were watching the operation. A glance at the writhing form of the workman, who groaned and screamed with pain, showed what had happened. He had taken hold of the pulley to swing the safe, and his fingers were caught in the rope and drawn into the sheaves of the block. His fellow workmen knew that to turn the winch either to hoist or lower the safe, might result in crushing the poor fellow's hand to a pulp. There was only one thing to do—the ropes must be cut and the safe allowed to drop to the sidewalk. As quickly as possible the sidewalks and the roadway were cleared of pedestrians and vehicles. Two stout fellows leaned out upon the sill and held the body of their suffering comrade so that he would not be carried down with the safe. Then the ropes were quickly severed close to the block. The man's hand was released, and he was drawn, half fainting, into the room and carried to a surgeon's. The big safe crashed through the sidewalk, smashed a heavy flag-stone into powder, and buried itself in the earthy floor of a vault under the street. The safe was not materially injured, and the workman's wounds are not dangerous.

An Ancient Method of Allaying Storms.

Cannonading the sky was formerly regarded in France as an effective means of allaying storms, not of raising them. Arago, the astronomer, traced the origin of this practice to a retired naval officer, who, having seen water-spouts destroyed at sea by the firing of cannon, tried in 1760 to subdue by similar means the storms of rain and hail which prevailed in the department to which he had retired. Arago also found that the firing of cannons in order to allay storms had been preceded in France by the custom of ringing the bells vigorously on such occasions.

An Insolent, Blundering Judge.

It is expedient for those "clothed with a brief authority" to be careful and courteous in its exercise. Some persons invested with power think that ignorance is smartness. Such persons, sooner or later, learn their error.

One evening in the Summer of 1742, a gentleman debarked from a barge at Paris, whither he, with a large quantity of baggage had been brought from Fontainebleau. He engaged a drayman to convey his baggage to a certain place, and then left the quay on foot.

The drayman omitted taking one article—a large box, whose shape attracted the attention of a custom-house officer. Thinking its contents might be contraband, he ordered it to be opened. To his astonishment he found therein the body of a woman wrapped from head to foot in linen bandages, whose discolored countenance indicated that she had died from violence.

The officer at once summoned a commissary of the police and a surgeon. Barely looking at the "remains," they also decided that a murder had been committed. A report to this effect being made at the police office, the body was removed to the morgue.

On the following morning, as the gentleman returned to the boat for his missing box, he was rudely seized and hurried before the police magistrate.

"We've got you, haven't we?" asked that officer, tauntingly, as the gentleman was brought in. "Perhaps you thought to escape, but I assure you that neither my officers nor myself can be found napping where justice demands that we be alert."

"I should like to know what all this means," said the gentleman.

"Your pretence of ignorance will not save you from the punishment due for your crime."

"My crime?"

"Yes,—the murder you committed, or to which you were an accessory."

"Murder! What makes you think I have been concerned in such a crime?"

"Did you not bring with you to this city a box containing the corpse of a woman?"

"Yes."

"Who placed the body in the box?"

"I did."

"How old was she?"

"Not far from twenty-five I think," smiling.

"Where was her home?"

"In Egypt."

"Make a note of these answers," said the magistrate to the clerk. Then turning to the gentleman he asked, "When did her death occur?"

"About 3,000 years ago."

"No levity," remarked "his honor," sternly.

"There is no levity in my statement. I must say you are the most stupid judge I ever saw. Had not you and your officers been the veriest ignoramuses, you would have known the 'body' is a mummy," contemptuously.

"A mummy?" repeated the dumbfounded magistrate.

"Yes; from Cairo, whence I have just returned."

"And who are you?"

"Count Damont, President of the Royal Society of Antiquities and member of the Academy of Inscriptions."

"My lord, I implore your forgiveness for the annoyance I have caused you," said the judge in the most abject humiliation.—Youth's Companion.

The general Government owes New Jersey 73 cents, an excess paid on the state by the direct tax of 1861. The United States treasurer's book shows this—and with interest added the amount would be $1.70.6—but there is no way of paying it without an act of Congress.

Jacques Dupin, the most famous model for old men in Paris, has posed for artists for more than half a century, and beginning in small boyhood as Cupid has grown gray in service, and now stands for such old patriarchs as Job and St. Anthony.

A man was received into the Laborisiere Hospital, Paris, the other day with a yard of rope hanging from his mouth. Traction upon the cord revealed a section of clothes line measuring eight feet. He had been surprised in an attempt at suicide and had tried to conceal his design by swallowing the cord. He lives.

Card telegrams are much in use in Paris. There are two kinds of them—one like the ordinary postal card in form and color, and the other blue and capable of being so closed as to conceal the writing. They are each large enough to contain a message of fully 60 words. When a card is dropped into the card telegram box of the nearest telegraph office the official in charge picks it up and has it transmitted through one of the pneumatic tubes which extend all over the city, thus insuring its delivery at the place to which it is addressed in less than half an hour from the time it was "posted."

A singular freak of nature has just been made known a short distance from Alliance, Ohio. The parents of the child which has been stamped by Dame Nature as one of her whimsicalities are disinclined to publicity, but the story has got abroad and the neighbors are flocking to see the wonder. A child has been born whose right hand is entirely transparent, differing entirely from the left hand, about which there is nothing abnormal. Through the pellucid skin is seen the veins and muscles, which seem in combination to form the word "star." The parents do not know how to account for it, but the old wives of the place have learned theories of the cause for the congenital peculiarity. Medical men are taking great interest in the transparency. But those who have seen the infant declare the appearance of a word depends very largely upon the imagination.

Short Talk With the Boys.

"Hurry up—quick!"

"Now, my boy, you want to stop dead still! They call this a fast age, and we are termed a fast nation, but in spite of that we have plenty of time. Take time to eat. Take time to dress. Take time to do whatever task you are engaged in to your complete satisfaction. I always feel like kicking a lazy man, and if I set out on a journey I can't go fast enough, but this impatience has lost me days of time and a good many dollars. If I want to make a shelf or bench I rush for the first handy board, saw it off hap-hazzard, pound in any sort of nails in any sort of way, and when the shelf is complete I have a shelf which won't fit by a jug-full, or a bench which rests on three legs and holds up the other one as if it had a sore foot. I have taken the wrong street car, lugged off other men's hats, left my change on store counters, bought sugar when I was told to buy butter, spoiled any number of boots, offended dozens of good men, and all because I wanted to save time.

"Don't rush. The older I grow the less I believe in the man who leaves a cloud of dust behind him. He will be wrong half the time. He will botch his work, upset the best calculations, and lose a dollar for every seventy-five cents he makes. A petulant, impatient boy makes a man who can't keep a friend. He will be obstinate, unreasonable, unforgiving and thoroughly despised. Don't argue that it is born in you and you can't help it. A boy can help any thing if he has any sand in his nature. He can exercise patience or give way to fits of anger which ought to be boot-jacked out of his nature to save him from the gallows.

But you hate to be bossed, eh? Well, my boy, if we could all do as we pleased this world would be a fine country to live in. Our workingmen would get to their labor at 10 o'clock in the morning and quit in time for 5 o'clock supper. Our stores might open in the morning or wait until afternoon. Our mills and factories would be run to suit the convenience of teamsters and engineers instead of owners. Our trains and boats would have to suit captains and conductors, and some days you would get one meal and other days three. We must have bosses and stand bossing. Don't start out with the idea that you can be independent. Don't think that you can sit with your folded arms and bring men to you with fat offers. Don't imagine that you are doing anybody a great favor by calling upon them and hinting around that you could be coaxed to take a situation. Do as your employer directs. If he doesn't know his business that's none of your affairs. Make up your mind that the boy who sets out to earn only three dollars per week will never get four. If he is determined to be worth four he will soon be receiving five.

I sat down with a half dozen of you the other day, and the opinion of the majority was that employers didn't make any distinction between a smart energetic boy and a drone. Don't be foolish, my lad. Nine employers out of ten had much rather advance a boy than to discharge him. A boy may not be watched as closely as a man, because we make allowances for his inexperience and follies and trifling nature, but don't you forget that he is soon sized up. If he is respectful and truthful and honest the employer who doesn't realize it and reward him is no man to work for.

THE STAR OF BETHLEHEM.

Likely Soon to Again Brighten the Circum-Polar Sky.

The theory concerning the "Star of Bethlehem" is based on a poetical foundation, having little to support it. In the year 1572 Tycho Brahe, a Dutch astronomer, discovered a new star near Caph, in the constellation Cassiopea. It increased in brilliancy until it was as bright as Venus, and could be easily seen at noonday. It continued to shine brightly for a month, then gradually grew dim and, in sixteen months disappeared from view. It was looked upon as a new creation or a sun on fire, and the general opinion was that it would never again shine in the star depths.

Forty years later the telescope was invented. When it was turned to the position in the heavens occupied by the blazing star, a minute star was found near the identical spot. This telescopic star is still there and is doubtless the same one that blazed forth in 1572. The discovery that it existed led astronomers to search astronomical records, and it was found that similar bright stars had appeared in the same region of the sky in 935 and 1264. Continuing back three periods from 945 we are brought to the near vicinity of the birth of Christ.

About twenty-four of these temporary stars have appeared in the last 2000 years, subject, like the star in Cassiopea, to sudden outbursts, followed by a return to their normal insignificance. They are now classed as variable stars, subject to sudden outbursts due to eruptions of blazing hydrogen, and which are followed by long periods of quiescence. The star was due in 1883. If it appears at all it will surely blaze forth by 1885. There is a possibility, therefore, that the long lost Star of Bethlehem, the Pilgrim Star, the Star of 1572, or Tycho Brahe's Star—for it is known by all of these names—will once more become a shining wonder in the sky.

The Execration and the Eulogy.

An Execration, lying in the shade reading a newspaper, was approached by a Eulogy.

"Anything new, Execration?"

"Yes; I've lost a job."

"How's that? Panic knock you out?"

"No; but you know Mr. Prominent Man?"

"What, that generous gentleman, so kind, yet so firm, so proud yet so humble, so profound yet so simple?"

"Yes, that old skinflint, so full of taffy yet so pig-headed, so vain yet so obsequious, so bombastic yet so puerile; that's the fellow."

"What of him?"

"Why he's dead, and that throws me out of a job."

"I'm sorry for you, Execration, but your loss is my gain; his death gives me plenty of work."

THE MODEL

Washer

AND

BLEACHER!

Weighs but 6 pounds. Can be carried in a small valise Illustration shows Machine in boiler. Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.

$ 1000.00 REWARD FOR ITS SUPERIOR.

Washing made light and easy. The clothes have that pure whiteness which no other mode of washing can produce. No rubbing required, no friction to injure the fabric. A 10 year old girl can do the washing as well as an older person.

To place it in every household THE PRICE HAS BEEN REDUCED to $2.50, and if not found satisfactory, money refunded. See what the "Canada Presbyterian," says about it—The Model Washer and Bleacher which Mr. C. W. Dennis offers to the public has many and valuable advantages. It is a time and labor saving machine, substantial and enduring, and is very cheap. From trial in the household we can testify to its excellence. Delivered to any express office in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Charges paid $3.00. Send for circulars.

HORSE SHOEING SPECIALTY.

Fever colic, unnatural appetite, fretfulness weakness, and convulsions, are some of the effects of worms in Children; destroy the worms with Dr. Low's Worm Syrup.

A gentleman who had been struck by a young lady's beauty was determined to follow the injunction "and kiss the rod that smote him."

The Hectic Flush, pale hallow cheeks and precarious apetite, indicate Worms. Freeman's Worm Powders will quickly and effectually remove them.

Why are apples which have been kept for some time like unmarried ladies? Because they are often shriveled and difficult to pair.

National Pills are sugar coated, mild but thorough, and are the best Stomach and Liver Pill in use.

The frost of last week did considerable damage to fruit trees and vegetable throughout Southern Ontario, and extended as far south as the Ohio river.

THE EFFECTS OF WHISKEY.

The effects of whiskey are always evil, and those who feed upon alcoholic stimulants, vainly endeavoring to cure coughs and consumption, but nurse a viper. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam is a remedy that is always reliable for all throat bronchial and lung troubles, and never does harm to any one.

In some places a broken-down front gate, produced in court, furnishes all the evidence a pretty girl needs to insure a favorable verdict in a breach of promise suit. Don't hang round the gate boys.

CURE FOR DEAFNESS.

As numerous testimonials will show, there is no more reliable cure for deafness than Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It is also the best remedy for ear ache, sore throat, croup, rheumatism, and for pains and lameness generally. Use externally and internally.

ACCIDENT.—A few days since a son of Mr. John Black of Glenelg fell off a load of hay and got his leg broke, Dr. Ghent attended him and he is now progressing favorably. Mr. Black is well known as he attended bar for the late Thos. Carson for some time.—Durham Chronicle.

FRAUDULENT TRANSACTIONS.

There are many frauds perpetrated in medicine, and many advertised remedies worse than useless. Not so with Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It remains as ever the best internal and external medicine for all pain, soreness and injuries with which human flesh is afflicted.

HYMENAL.—Just as we were making up we hear that W. E. McAlister Esq., was married to Miss Maggie Lauder and lett for their wedding tour by the morning train. The happy couple have our heartiest congratulations.—Durham Chronicle.

NEVER GIVE UP.

If you are suffering with low and depressed spirits, loss of appetite, general debility, disordered blood, weak constitution, headache, or any disease of a bilious nature, by all means procure a bottle of Electric Bitters. You will be surprised to see the rapid improvement that will follow; you will be inspired with new life; strength and activity will return; pain and misery will cease; and henceforth you will rejoice in the praise of Electric Bitters. Sold at fifty cents a bottle by Turner & Co. 6

A. O. U. W.—There are 13,000 Workmen in Illinois. In Canada and the United States there are over 130,000 Workmen.

WHAT IN A NAME?

Scrofula is so called from the Latin scrofa, a pig, from the supposition that the disease came from eating swine's flesh. It is often inherited from parents, and leades to abscesses, ulcerous sores, debility, king's evil and consumption. The case of the Rev. Wm. Stout, of Wiarton, who suffered 23 years from scrofulous abscesses, is one of the most remarkable on record. Burdock Blood Bitters cured him after the best medical skil had failed.

On Monday evening as Thomas Dixon, of Clarksburg, was passing up the Gravel road near here with the stallion, S. James, the horse became frightened at the barking of a dog, and Dixon getting out of the rig to quiet him was kicked in the mouth, knocking him senseless. He was carried into a house close at hand where he soon became conscious. He was able to walk down to the dentist's next morning and get his teeth fixed. —Monitor

HOW TO CURE A COLD.

Take some gentel opening medicine, bathe the feet in warm water, adding a spoonful of mustard; remain indoors; equalize the circulation with warm bath and friction; drink warm gingar tea, and take Hagyard's Pectorial Balsam, the most perfect and the safest cough cure that can be procured.

SOME BEEF.—Mr. Sam Scott recently purchased from Lang Bros. a fine beef cow weighing 1,680, for which he paid $108.75. Mr. Scott intends shipping her to Port Arthur.—O. S. Advertiser.

A CELEBRATED CASE.

The remarkable case of W. A. Edgars, of Frankville, who suffered from disease of the liver and kidneys so badly that all hope of recovery was abandoned. He remained ten and thirteen days without action of the bowels. Four bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters restored him perfect health, which he had not known for twenty years before

BUCKLEN'S ARNICA SALVE.

The best Salve in the world for cuts, bruises sores, ulcers, salt rheum, fever sores, letter, chapped hands, chilblains, corns, and all skin eruptions, and positively cures piles or no pay required. It is guaranteed to give perfect satisfaction, or money refunded. Price 25 cents per box. For Sale by A. Turner & Co.

Ye Batchlors on Collingwood Mountain don't be discouraged this being leap year and the parental example given by our friend Mr. John Shaw, a young boy of 60 who entered into holy bonds of matrimony with a girl of 50 on Friday last. We wish the young couple heaps of prosperity.

IMPORTANT CHANGES.

There are two periods in the life of every female when the system undergoes great changes. First the change from childhood to womanhood; next, that of womanhood to old age. These are the critical changes of life, and the system should be nourished and regulated by that matchless tonic, Burdock Blood Bitters. It is invaluable in all diseases peculiar to females.

Letter Heads neatly printed and put up in pads at this office.

THE SECRET OUT.

The secret of beauty has been at last revealed. Without good health, pure blood and a fair clear skin none can possess good looks. What is more repulsive than pimples, blotches and a sallow or pasty complexion? Burdock Blood Bitters reveal the fact that all can gain pure blood and freedom from the repulsive diseases of the skin that result from impurities.

A GREAT DISCOVERY

That is daily bringing joy to the homes of thousands by saving many of their dear ones from an early grave. Truly is Dr. King's King's New Discovery for consumption, coughs, colds, asthma, bronchitis, hay fever, loss of voice, tickling in the throat, pain in side, and chest, any disease of the throat and lungs, a positive cure guaranteed. Trial bottles free at Turner & Co's. drug store. Large size $1. 6

BEAR CAUGHT.—On Sunday last Mr. Thos. Laughlan, and Mr. J. Gordon captured a large bear weighing 180 lbs in the neighborhood of Ventry. Brum has been feasting on a couple of sheep but his feasting days are ended now. Notwithstanding several have been caught lately, depredations are still being comitted among the sheep.

A FACT.

There are oils white, and oils black.
Put up in bottles short and tall,
But Hagyard's Yellow Oil, for pain,
Is the very best oil of all.

It cures rheumatism, neuralgia, deafness, sprains, bruises, contracted cords, sore throat, frost bites, burns and all soreness of the flesh. It is for external and internal use.

The Bay City, Mich., Vindicator, a paper published in the interests of labor, warns all Canadians to keep away from Michigan, and asks Canadian papers to copy. It says the labor market is already overcrowded, and American workmen will starve if the influx continues. Canadians had better stay at home.

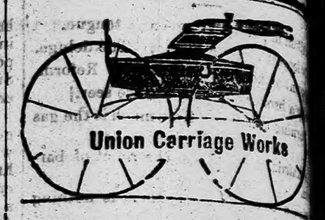
DANGER IN THE AIR.

The recent strange planetary movements and electrical phenomena have developed the fact that the earth is passing through a dangerous period when atmospheric influence will seriously effect human health. Fortify the weakened system with that grand tonic regulator, Burdock Blood Bitters, and avoid malarial blood poisons.

One of the most successful druggists in New Orleans is a woman. New Orleans fellows say it is so much more pleasant to be poisoned by a woman than a man, besides being quicker and surer.

SAVED FROM THE SCALPEL.

A Toronto lady, Mrs. Berkenshaw, contracted a disease of the knee joint and was advised to submit it to a surgical operation by the best physicians attending; all other treatment having failed, when Hagyard's Yellow Oil was tried and speedily effected a cure. It is the unfailing remedy for accidents and emergencies, and is for external and internal use.



HAGYARD'S YELLOW OIL CURES RHEUMATISM

FREEMAN'S WORM POWDERS

Are pleasant to take. Contain their own Purgative. Is a safe, sure, and effectual destroyer of worms in Children or Adults.

REMARKABLE RESTORATION.

Mrs. A. O'Brien, 372 Exchange Street, Buffalo, was supposed to be dying with consumption and abandoned by her physician. She suffered terribly and was reduced in flesh to ninety pounds. In this condition she resorted to Burdock Blood Bitters, and now enjoys perfect health and weighs one hundred and forty-six. She will gladly answer enquiring sufferers on receipt of U. S. postage stamp.

Fishing Match.

The Markdale Fishing Club held their annual fishing match on Friday, the 6th inst. The members started from the Revere Hotel at 8 o'clock a. m., and after a good day's sport, returned about 6 p. m., at which time members had to deliver their fish up to the captains to be counted. The following is the result:—

Dan Shea, Cap.	187,	J. Irwin, Cap.	65
Geo. Noble	180,	J. Galbraith	96
Alex. Mathers	56,	Jas. Ker	40
Wilson Benson	114,	R. Askin	14

Robt. Sproule	45,	Jas. Tweed	59
W. Haskett	45,	Ed. Sproule	12
Sam. Morrow	63,	Geo. Crow	80
Total.....	677	Total.....	471

This left Shea a winner by 206. After supper, which was a credit to the host, and to which the hungry fishers did ample justice, the members proceeded to properly organize the club. Geo. Noble was appointed chairman and Jas. Galbraith treasurer.

Death of Vennor.

THE CELEBRATED METEOROLOGIST CARRIED OFF BY RHEUMATISM.

MONTREAL, Que., June 9.—Henry G. Vennor, aged 45, died yesterday of rheumatism, with which he had been laid up for a long time.

The late Mr. Vennor was educated in the High School, Montreal, and went on the Geological Survey some fifteen years ago. He was employed in Manitoulin Island, and afterwards in North Hastings county. Subsequently he was promoted in the Geological Survey, and had charge of explorations on the north side of the Ottawa. It was while in these explorations that his attention was drawn to the possibilities of weather forecasting. A few years ago he resigned his position on the survey and opened an assayer's office in Montreal. He was a fellow of the Royal Geological Society of England, and the author of a work on the Birds of Canada. For some time past he had been in ill-health, being a sufferer from spinal disease. Latterly he had to give up work completely, and was confined to bed. Mr. Vennor's father died a couple of weeks ago. Mr. A. H. Vennor, with Rice Lewis & Co., on Toronto street, Toronto, is the uncle of the late Mr. H. G. Vennor. In forecasting the weather Mr. Vennor's chief reliance was upon the resemblance which certain periods of weather in the past bore, in regard to their general curves of temperature and rainfall, to weather immediately preceding the time of his forecast. He naturally assumed that where two distant periods were much alike, the weather which followed would also be much alike. Of course there were also many other indications which aided him in forming an opinion of the probable weather. Of the effect conjunctive of the planets on terrestrial weather he did not assume to know anything, and no doubt ridiculed prognostications founded upon them. On the whole his methods had a measure of practical common sense about them, and were considerably superior to that of so-called weather prophets of an older time.

SUDDEN DEATH IN DURHAM.—About two months ago an operation was preformed on Miss Ada B. Crooks of this Town, to take away a tumor that was growing in her side. For a short time afterwards she appeared to be mending nicely, but soon a second tumor was found to be growing rapidly in the old wound, and on Tuesday last a second operation was performed to take it away, and the operation was scarcely over when Miss Crooks asked her mother if it was all over, and in a few minutes was dead. The funeral took place yesterday, and of those attending there was scarcely a dry eye, so great was the sympathy felt of the mother so suddenly bereaved but no one could scarcely refrain from remarking on viewing the deceased in her coffin that she was "beautiful in death." A funeral sermon will be preached by the rev. Mr. Lake in the Town Hall next Sabbath evening.—Review.

PATENTS

A Witness for the Defence.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER II.

When I got back to town, the sessions were only a week off; so the first thing I did was to call on the solicitor in charge of my murder case, in order to learn from him how it stood, and to take it off his hands. The magistrate, of course, had sent the prisoner for trial. When I came to read the depositions, the case against him seemed perfectly simple, and as conclusive as circumstantial evidence could make it. The crime had not occurred so long ago but that a diligent search had unearthed some witnesses. The servant-girl, who had now become the wife of a dairyman in the immediate neighborhood, was found. She proved the bad conduct of young Harden, and the ill-will which gradually grew up between him and her former mistress. She also spoke to his ejectment from the house on the day of the murder, and to his threats at the street door. She swore to the knife, which had been in the possession of the police ever since, as having belonged to the prisoner. There were other witnesses to the same facts; and the landlord, my client, and several others, proved the flourishing of the identical knife and the ominous words in the public house. To complete the chain, the man who had instructed me proved the finding of the knife in the room where the murder was committed; and two or three witnesses remembered being by his side and seeing him stoop down and pick it up. These, with the final facts of his sudden disappearance and change of name, appeared both to me and to my friend to be capable of being spun into a rope quite strong enough to swing John Harden out of the world.

"But," said my solicitor-friend, "the queerest thing of all is that no one is going to appear for the prisoner."

"No one to appear for him?"

"No one. Young Elkin holds a watching brief on behalf of the prisoner's master, and that is all. He said Harden had been in Mr. Slocum's—that's his master—service for over seven years, behaving extremely well all the time. He was invaluable to his old master, who is something of an invalid. He had turned religous, and was disgusted at his former wicked life."

"But I suppose he has money—or, at anyrate, if Slocum is so fond of him, why doesn't he pay for the defence?"

"Why, it seems that his notion of religion forbids Harden to avail himself of worldly arts. Slocum is only too anxious to retain some one; but Harden won't have it, and no one can persuade him. Says he is in the hands of a Higher Power, and it shall be given him what he shall speak, and all the rest of it. He wanted to make a speech to the magistrate; but Slocum, by Elkin's advice, did manage to induce him to hold his tongue for the present, and say he would reserve his defence. Of course they hope he will come to his senses before the trial. But I don't know how that will be. I never saw such an obstinate pig. Only gave in to his master about not speaking because the poor man began to whimper in court!"

The main part of my work had been done for me, and it only remained to bespeak copies of the depositions, see the witnesses, and make sure that they intended to say at the Old Bailey substantially the same things as they had said at the police court—a most necessary precaution, the imagination being so vivid in people of this class that they are very likely to amplify their tale if possible—and prepare the brief for the prosecuting counsel. This done, I had but to let things take their course.

When the day of the trial came I was betimes in my place at the Central Criminal Court, having various other cases in hand there. The prisoners, as is customary, were first put up and arraigned—that is, had the substance of their several indictments read over to them—and were called on to plead "guilty" or "not guilty." These disposed of, the case of John Harden was called, and I looked at him with some curiosity. No sooner had I done so than I knew that his was a face upon which at some time or other I had looked before, and of which I had taken note. It is a useful peculiarity of mine that I never forget a face to which I have once paid any attention, and I can generally recollect the place and circumstances under which I last saw it. But here the latter part of my powers failed me. I knew the face well, but could not imagine when and where I had beheld it. I even knew that I had seen the man bare-headed, and that he was not then, as now, bald on the crown. The thing worried me not a little. In the meanwhile, John Harden was being put up to take his trial for the murder of Agatha Harden.

"I m' lud, appear to prosecute in this case," said my counsel, starting up and down again like the blade of an knife.

"Does nobody appear for the prisoner?" asked the judge.

"I understand, m' lud,, that the prisoner is not represented," said counsel, appearing and disappearing as before.

"My lord," said an agitated voice from the body of the court, "I have used all possible efforts——"

"Si-lence!" proclaimed the usher.

"Who is that?" inquired the judge, looking over his spectacles.

"My lord, I am this foolish fellow's master; and I am perfectly convinced——"

"I cannot hear you, sir. If the prisoner wishes to have counsel assigned to him for his defence, I will name a gentleman, and will take care that the prisoner shall have due opportunity for his instruction; and if you desire to give evidence on his behalf, you can do so.—Prisoner, is it your wish that counsel be assigned to you for your defence?"

Harden had been standing with his head slightly bent, and his clasped hands resting on the rail of the dock. He now looked up at the judge, and replied in a grave and impassive voice: "My lord, I wish no help but the help of God. I am in His hands, and I am an innocent man. If He sees good to deliver me, He will do so. Who am I, that I should interfere with his work?"

"You appear to me," said the judge gently, "to be under an unfortunate delusion. You say rightly that you are in God's hands; but that should not hinder you from using such instruments for your deliverance as He offers you. Once more I will ask, do you now desire to be represented by counsel?"

"I do not, my lord."

"So be it.—Now, Mr. Clincher."

Rising once more, counsel for the prosecution proceeded to open his case. It was clear and straightforward, put concisely and tellingly, and embraced the facts which the reader already knows. He then called his witnesses; and as each after each left the box, it was easy to see from the faces of the jury that things were likely to go hard with the prisoner. Always, in answer to the inquiry, "Do you wish to put any questions to this witness?" Harden replied:

"No, my lord. He has said the truth, for all I know."

So smoothly did the trial run its course, that only one incident called for remark. This was when my client got into the box; and so indecently eager did he appear to be to procure the conviction of the prisoner, that he twice called down upon himself a severe rebuke from the judge, for persistently volunteering irrelevant statements to Harden's prejudice. And when counsel at length said, "That, m' lud, is my case," and sat down, but little doubt remained as to the prisoner's fate. I still sat with my gaze fascinated by the set face in the dock, trying—trying to remember when and where I had last looked upon it.

"Do you propose, prisoner, to call any witnesses?" asked the judge.

"Only my master, my lord—Mr. Slocum. He'll speak for me, and he'll say, I know, that I'm not the man to kill any living thing."

"Very well.—And now, before calling him, do you desire to address the jury?"

The interest of the case, which, except for that interest which is inseparable from a trial for murder, had slightly flagged, revived now that a human being was virtually at grips with death. For what had just passed meant that there was no defence or attempt at a defence, that the jury must convict, and that the man must die, without hope of mercy for so cowardly and ungrateful a murderer. There was not a sound in the court. It was late in the afternoon, and the winter sun was setting. Its rays lit up the crimson hangings, and scarlet robes of the judge, the intent faces, all looking one way, the dropping head and white composed countenance of the prisoner—the man standing up there in full health and strength, and whose life was going down with the sun.

"I have but a few words to say, my lord and gentlemen. I didn't do it. I was bad enough, and maybe cruel enough, in those days, to do it; but I didn't. I was so drunk and so mad, my lord and gentlemen, that I might have done it if it had happened earlier in the day, unknown almost to myself, and be standing here rightly enough. But I know I couldn't have done it, and why? Because I was miles away at the time. My poor aunt, as I've heard from what has been said, must have been killed between a quarter to and a quarter past eight in the evening. Well at eight o'clock I was at least five miles off. If I'd done it directly the girl went out of the house—as she says, at a quarter to eight—it isn't according to reason that I could have broken open the cupboard, took the money, and got five miles off in a quarter of an hour." He stopped and drew the cuff of his coat across his forehead.

Where had I seen him before? Where and when had I seen him do that very action?

"O gentleman, I couldn't have done it! I couldn't, bad as I was! I know, now, how bad that must have been—the mercy of God has been upon me since those days—but bad as I was, I owed her too much, and knew it, to have hurt her in any way. Won't you believe me? I tell you I was miles away at the time—miles away. Who can tell as you're saying true? you will ask. No one, I suppose. Not a soul was near me that I knew, to come here and speak the truth for me this day. But I know the same God that saved Daniel can save me from a sorry end, if it is His will to do it—if not, His will be done! I'm keeping you too long, only saying the same over and over again. I'll just tell you how it was, and I've done, and you must do as duty bids you."

Another pause. The silence of death, or rather of a deathbed. The faces in the distance of the darkened court shimmered through the gloom, like those of spectres waiting to welcome a coming shade. Then the gaslight burst forth, and all sprang into sudden distinctness, and there was a general half stir as of relief.

"Oh, isn't there one here that can speak for me? Is there any one who remembers the great gas main explosion in ——Street that year?"

There was again a stir, and a more decided one. Clearly there were many in court who remembered it. I did for one. And remembering it, I seemed as one in a tunnel, who sees the glimmer from the distant opening, but can distinguish no feature of the landscape beyond.

"I was there—that night. It was the night of the day I was turned out of doors—the night of the murder. How I came to be there, so far from my aunt's neighborhood I don't know, but I found myself working hard, helping to lift the stones and timber of the house fronts that were blown in, and getting the poor crushed people out. I worked a long time, till I was like to drop; and a policeman clapped me on the back and gave me a word of praise and a drink of beer out of a can. I wonder where that policeman is now, and if he'd remember?"

He did not respond, wherever he might be. No one to help—no friendly plank to bridge over the yawning grave. What was it, this that I was trying so hard to recall?

"I wandered off after that into the by-streets. I knew those parts well. I had had a comrade who used to live there, and many a wicked and foolish prank we'd played thereabouts. The beer I had just drank on an empty stomach had muddled me again a bit, but I was quite sober enough to know every step of the way I went, and remember it now. I turned up Hadley street, and then to the left along Blewitt street; and just when my aunt must have been struggling with the wretch that took her life whoever it was, I heard a clock strike eight. I did, gentlemen, and I suppose I never thought of it since; but now I remember it as clear as day. I was standing at the time at the corner of Hauraki street.

It all came back to me in a moment! I heard the patter of the rain on the cab-roof—I saw the gleam of the infrequent lights on the wet flags—I listened to the objurgations of the cabman at the obstructing dray—I took note of the reflection in the mirror, the queer street name which would not rhyme so as to make sense. The strokes of the clock striking eight were in my ears. I saw the lamp at the corner, and the man underneath looking up at it—the man with the short beard face, the sharp chin, the long thin mouth turned down at the corners, and the blank in the front teeth—the innocent man I was hounding to his death—the prisoner at the bar!

As I sprang to my feet, down with a crash went my bag full of papers, my hat and umbrella, so that even the impassive judge gave a start, and the usher, waking up, once more proclaimed "Si-lence!" with shocked and injured inflection. Heedless of the majesty of the law, I beckoned to my counsel, and as he leaned over to me in surprise I whispered earnestly in his ear. I never saw the human face express more entire astonishment. However, seeing that I was unmistakably in earnest, he merely nodded and rose to his feet.

"Your lordship will pardon me," he said, "for interfering at this stage between the prisoner and the jury; but I am instructed to make a communication which I feel sure will be as astounding to your lordship and the jury as it is to myself. I think I may say that it is the most surprising and unprecedented thing which ever occurred in a court of justice. My lord, the solicitor who instructs me to prosecute tenders himself as a witness for the defence!"

A LOST EARL.

Lord Drummond Turns Up as a Porter in a New York Shipping House.

A despatch from New York, says: At the instance of a lady belonging to a wealthy and respected New York family, an old friend of the Lady Capel—whose name is withheld at her request—a correspondent has been engaged for some time past in an investigation as to the whereabouts of Lady Capel's son, Lord Drummond, heir to the earldom of Perth and Melfort, and a kinsman of Queen Victoria, who eloped to America with his governess twelve years ago, thus incurring the resentment of his noble relations. This scion of an ancient house was found recently working as a porter in the Broadway clothing house of Carhart, Whitford & Co. A young man, coatless, heated, and with collar loosened, came forward and extended a big, brown, toil-stained hand.

"You are Lord Drummond, I believe," said the reporter.

"I am," said he, a little surprised, but in no wise disconcerted. He was fully six feet tall and splendidly built, had a finely shaped head and full regular features, with closely cut light hair and moustache.

His story, as gathered from himself and other sources, is as follows: George Essex Montifex, Lord Drummond, only son of Malcolm, Visount Forth, and the Lady Mary Capel, niece of the Earl of Essex, was born September, 2, 1856. At 12 years of age he was an orphan in the care of his grandmother, the Countess of Perth and Melfort, who confided his education to a nursery governess named Hariett Harrison. Possessing the entire confidence of her master and mistress, the governess and her ward were much together, without exciting suspicion. When it was learned one morning that they had mysteriously disappeared, the effect was startling. Matters were not improved much when the young couple returned later in the day, and Lord Drummond shyly announced that he was married to Hariett, and prayed his grandfather's forgiveness and blessing. The ancient Earl stormed at what he denounced as a degradation of the noble name, and angrily forbade his young heir to ever enter his house again.

The bride and groom took steerage passage for America and arrived at Castle Garden almost penniless. The young Lord vowed never to desert his wife or to return to Scotland until he returned as Earl of Perth, and his wife was received as benefitted her new rank. He assumed the plebeian name of George Johnson, and went to work as a shipping clerk in a wholesale flour house in South street, where he remained working steadily for about two years, until his employers collapsed in the panic of 1873. Except while on a voyage to the West Indies in a schooner a year ago Lord Drummond has been in the employ of Carhart, Whitford & Co. ever since, advancing a little, but still half shipping clerk and half porter, and evincing much more inclination for physical than mental exercises.

"The only subject of historical interest which we saw in our travels," says Mr. Carles in an official report of a journey into the central provinces of Corea, "was a curious structure resembling a rude altar, consisting of one massive slab, placed horizontally on small blocks of granite, which supported it on three sides, leaving the other side open and a hollow space some sixteen feet by ten feet beneath. Of these quasi-altars several were standing in the valleys; but though it must have cost immense labor to place these stones in position, no legend was current to account for their existence, except one which connected them with the Japanese invasion at the end of the sixteenth century, when the invaders were said to have erected them to suppress the influences of the earth (tichi). Whatever their origin, they have been left undisturbed. Of the influence of superstition over the people constant evidence is seen, in offerings to the spirits of the mountains in the shape of rags tied to the branches of shrubs, heaps of stones on the tops of mountain ridges, long ropes hanging from trees, shrines two or three feet high placed by the roadside, and, the most quaint of all; in thick planks set in the ground, with one face rudely hewn and painted to represent a human head, with teeth fiercely prominent. These figures are said to be intended to keep foxes out of the villages, and thus protect the people from their spells and witchery. Beyond these few obstacles and a small Buddhist temple, near a fine figure of Buddha cut in the rock not far from the North Gate of Soui, there was no trace of any religious feeling having any hold upon the people. Had we gone a few miles farther north we were assured we would have found at Chin Kang Shan not only the most beautiful scenery in Corea, but mountains thickly studded with temples to which pilgrims throng in summer; but we neither saw any such or any traces of religious observances among the people, even at the new or full moon. We are told however, of sacrifices being offered to the mountain spirits before a mine was opened. Graves as a rule are placed close together on the slope of the hill, without any stone or mark to identify them; but occasionally a horseshoe cleaning is seen in the woods where some distinguished person lies buried, whose name and birthplace are given on a rough slab of stone. The funerals that we met were of the simplest character, and at one village the remains of the body of an old woman, who had been eaten by a tiger, were being burned in a fire of brush wood lighted on the spot.

ABOUT LAUGHTER.

The Commercial Value of a Good Laugh.

A really musical laugh is perhaps rarer than a really musical voice. The giggle, the snigger, the half-choked laugh are common enough; but how seldom do we hear that melodious sound, the laugh in its perfection. It should not be shrill, nor too loud nor too long. It should not bear any double meaning, any hidden venom in its mirth. It should not be so boisterous as to exhaust the laughter and deafen the listeners.

There is the loud guffaw of the vulgar, and the laughter which appears likely to tear the laugher in pieces, causing him to wipe his eyes after the explosion is over. There is the laugh of embarrassment, when a shy person at a loss what to say next, "remarks to he," as Artemus Ward describes it. There is the schoolgirl's giggle; and the schoolboy's sniggle, as he reflects on some recently-perpetrated, but still uncollected, piece of mischief. There is the chuckle of the successful man.

All these laughs bear some family resemblance to each other; they all, in their degree, express sensations of pleasure. There are darker descriptions of laughter. There are laughs more cutting than the bitterest speeches, more alarming than the cruelest threats. Satirical laughter is most offensive. A laugh can convey contempt which words would fail to express.

Is any one proof against being annoyed by ridicule? Even a dog is sensible when he is laughed at, and resents the impertinence. Some animals are indeed quite as sensitive to derision as human beings. The laughter of the underbred which finds open amusement in the minor troubles of their neighbours—say the ridicule lavished on sea-sick arrivals at pier, or on hapless foreigners in an altercation with a cabman, or an old gentleman who falls down a slide—also ranks among "laughs offensive."

Then there is the laugh of incredulity. When Tom goes to his rich old uncle, full of glowing descriptions of the performance of the lady to whom he is engaged, or of the appointment which he expects to obtain, does the old gentleman damp his nephew's ardor by a long harangue? No, he only gives a dry laugh; and Tom's hopes of a cheque fall rapidly.

Too rare laughers are as unpopular as too ready ones. A teller of good stories never forgives the man who does not laugh at his jokes. Many persons have make their fortunes by laughing at judicious moments; applauding some poor jest, or becoming convulsed with mirth at a dull pun. To be duly appreciative of his patron's wit was an important part of the duty of a hanger-on. With what ready laughter are a schoolmaster's witticisms received by his class!

There is a story of a dramatic author, whose play had been accepted, being requested to make sundry alterations to suit the taste of the actors. Among other changes, the manager suggested that a "laugh" should be introduced at the conclusion of a speech of an out-going performer. "It would give him a better exit." The author pleaded that to admit this alteration would spoil the whole dialogue, but the manager was urgent still. "Think it over, and do what you can, B——'s position in the theater demands it!" When laughs are thus priced it is not wonderful that persons who rarely use their risible muscles are unpopular.

The Cork Oak.

At present we depend for cork upon the countries bordering the Mediterranean. In these countries the actual market value of cork is ten times what it was at the beginning of the century, and it is likely to go still higher. In Sardinia, Sicily and Naples, extensive cork plantations are being destroyed for the purpose of obtaining the tannin of superior quality yielded by the bark and carbonate of soda from the ashes of the wood. This destruction has been going on for years, while planting has not even replaced the trees destroyed, except in France and its African dependency. As long ago as 1822 the French Government appropriated forty-five hundred francs, which were to be divided among those who, planting in 1823, should possess at the expiration of ten years plantations of ten thousand vigorous saplings. In 1834 only three persons had been entitled to the reward. But France has now over five hundred thousand acres of cork plantations in Algiers, yielding a considerable revenue to the State. About fifty years ago the Spanish began to encourage the planting of the cork oak, and the number of trees in that country has increased. This increase would have been greater but for the fact that, while in some provinces cork has become the chief source of wealth, in others, many proprietors destroyed their trees in order to clear their ground for more valuable productions. The cork oak grows to the height of about fifty feet. In Algeria and in the Spanish province of Estremadura the development of the tree is somewhat greater. The tree reaches a great age. It continues to grow for one hundred and fifty or two hundred years, and after its growth it still yields cork, though of an inferior quality.

In some parts of Spain it is customary to destroy the tree when the quality of its cork begins to deteriorate. In Europe the tree is met with as high as forty-five degrees north, but it needs a warm climate. In France and in Spain it is found sixteen hundred feet above the level of the sea, while in Algeria it occurs at double that altitude. The tree can bear a minimum average annual temperature of fifty-five degrees Fahrenheit. It prefers land sloping to the southward and near the sea. Granite lands and slatey, sandy and siliceous soils are very unsuitable, and it does not take kindly to damp soils. It grows spontaneously in virgin soils where silica or silico-argillaceous compounds abound. Lands suitable for the vine are also suitable for the cork.

To reject consecrated opinions demands a consecrated mind.

When we get to heaven, no doubt there will be great surprises for nearly all of us. Here we are like chestnuts with the outside burrs on; there we will be without the burrs, and many of us will be astonished to find there that we are not half as far as we thought ourselves on earth.

Jeanne Bernier's Carbine.

(Translated from the French of Trebert Dumontell.)

This is not a tale. It is a souvenir that I retrace.

It was in 1870, in a farm-house of Champagne on the edge of the forests. Over the mantlepiece were hung three guns with massive butts and glistening barrels. One belonged to the father, the other to the son and the third to the grandson.

Near the window a woman of vigorous health and rare beauty was spinning on a spinning-wheel. She was not yet forty. She was the daughter-in-law, the wife, the mother.

The three men took down their guns and went out furtively from the house after having first embraced the woman, who, after ward, leaning from the window, sent them a stout-hearted salute.

Where were they going? Is it necessary to say? The Germans had just invaded the country.

Left alone, Jeanne Bernier, her arms crossed upon her breast, gazed sadly at a carbine that stretched along the wall between a pewter crucifix and an image of the Wandering Jew. If, with your finger, you could draw aside the crape tied around the barrel you would see a red spot, a stain of blood that flowed for the country.

But why was it there, that useless carbine at rest while the three guns were about to go to work and make the powder talk also? Was there not in the neighborhood a hand to take it down, a finger to load it, a French eye to aim at a German breast along its barrel? Where was the owner of that carbine? He was dead—he was Jeanne's brother. One evening when he had gone out to hunt Prussians, they had brought him back to the farmhouse, mortally wounded by a ball. He was now now sleeping under a white stone, and all the noise of war could not awake him. That carbine had done its duty; it was no longer a weapon, it was a family relic.

Meanwhile the Prussians were approaching; every day floods of men and horses stretched out and swelled, invading a hamlet, a village, a town, a wood, a forest, a field—a rain, covering our mountains and our cities, reddening with a foam of blood our brooks and rivers and from every side overflowing upon the plain.

One night a hand rapped gently at the door of the farmhouse, that opened to give admission to a sharpshooter. He was a native of the district, one of Bernier's friends. He informed Jeanne that her father, her husband and her son were dead.

Surprised and surrounded in the depths of a wood by thirty Prussians, twelve sharpshooters had resisted their attack. The Berniers had fought and fallen like heroes.

The father and the husband fell the first, almost at the same time, upon five or six corpses of which they had made a rampart.

Leaning against a tree, Jeanne's son faced the fury of his assailants. He was like an oak backed against an oak. He seemed invulnerable, and each time he thrust forth his bayonet there was a dead man upon its point.

Then a young Bavarian officer approached, and with a smile on his lips, stretched him out with a rifle shot, between the father and the grandfather.

Thus died the three Berniers; thus were extinguished in an instant three generations.

After having delivered his message the sharpshooter, taking advantage of the darkness of the night, said farewell to the widow and departed to join his comrades.

An hour later, Jeanne took down her brother's carbine, put on the garments of the dead man, and in turn quitted that farm house that her family would never see again.

She was now no longer either the daughter, the wife or the mother; she was only a French woman. What do I say? She was only a soldier.

The three guns were silent, and it was the carbine, that, passing like a heritage from the hand of her brother to that of his sister, was going to make the powder talk.

The first warble of the birds had scarcely announced the day, when Jeanne, crouching amid the bushes, saw on the edge of the forest a Uhlan trotting slowly along on his black horse.

He was a slender young man with a blonde moustache and blue eyes. From time to time he removed his helmet shaking out his curly locks to the breeze of the wood, breathing with keen enjoyment the balmy morning air; then he put spurs to his horse and murmured a musical German song, the while admiring the beautiful scenery of France.

Jeanne called to him; he halted. She fired; he fell.

"I have avenged my father!" said she, and disappeared.

And all that day she remained concealed in the bushy thickets, her eyes open, her ear listening, and her carbine in her hand. Not a sound save the chant of the cricket or the hoarse cry of the crow.

But in the evening, at nightfall, the neighing of a horse made her start.

Jeanne slowly raised her head, gazing through a large fern as if behind a jalousie.

It was a lieutenant who was advancing at the head of six dragoons. He was rosy and stout like those enormous Cupids, that, upon the smoky panels of the Munich breweries, pour out beer for King Gambrinus to drink.

He seemed soldered to his saddle as his pipe seemed riveted to his lips. Through his spectacles sparkled a shrewd glance that sounded the vicinity, examined the bushes and the ditches, the stones, the briars and the tufts of grass. One might have believed him mounted on a horse fabricated at Nuremberg. When he halted the six dragoons halted. One might have thought that one bridle rein guided that automatic cavalcade.

Jeanne brought her carbine to her shoulder; a ball hissed, and the lieutenant, staggering in his saddle like a drunken man, suddenly bent toward the head of the frightened horse that started off at at a gallop, bearing away a dead man.

"I have avenged my husband," cried the widow, while the dragoons, thinking themselves about to be hemmed in, vanished at the top of their horses' speed.

Rapidly as a deer Jeanne fled across the forest. Her gourd was empty and she had not a mouthful of bread left. But she had bullets! A streamlet gave her water to drink; a filbert tree bore her supper at the top of its boughs.

On emerging from a thick copse she saw a cottage at a turn of the road. There, without doubt, she would find bread and rest; perhaps a shelter for the night that was approaching; she advanced, then suddenly halted, stooped and disappeared. At the door of the cottage stood a German sentinel. At the window a captain of superb stature was reading a letter from the banks of the Spree or the borders of the Rhine, a family or love letter that he caressed with his eyes and read over and over again.

Jeanne slipped along and approached without stirring a single branch, without making a grain of sand cry out.

Suddenly the report of a weapon rang out through the wood and from every tree fled a bird.

Captain what did your bethrothed say to you? You will never again see the girl who loves you.

Now there was only a corpse at the window.

All the soldiers rushed from the cottage, their guns in their hands, ready to repulse the enemy. But the enemy had fled afar, shouting:

"I have avenged my son!"

Jeanne Bernier quitted the forest that patrols furrowed in every direction. It was elsewhere that she took her carbine. Were not Prussians to be found everywhere? But what did she want further? Had she not avenged her father, her husband and her son?

Five days had elapsed since the death of the captain, but she was still braving the heroic but wretched life of the woods. One day she dined on a cup of milk given her by a goatherd; another time, she, the rich farm owner, shared with an old mendicant the bread of beggary.

Lying one morning amid the heath and broom that bordered the highway, Jeanne Bernier perceived a mass of soldiers waving about upon the sunlighted road. Was it a company, a regiment, an army? They were more than five hundred, more than a thousand strong, and behind these foot soldiers the cavalry pressed onward in a cloud of dust.

At the head of that formidable column rode, stern and impassible, an old chief with a long white moustache and a scarred visage.

He was enormously stout, and at each movement of his horse his huge body swayed like a barrel; but his vigorous hand firmly held a naked sword that shone in the sun.

Jeanne raised her carbine, and the Prussian General, lifting both his hands toward heaven, rolled like a mass beneath his horse's hoofs.

But instantly, struck full in the breast by a bullet, the handsome Jeanne Bernier fell in her turn upon the golden broom, murmuring:

"I have avenged my country!"

Names of Vessels.

The London Nautical Magazine says "The name borne by the largest number of vessels is Mary. There are over 200 sailing vessels and 5 steamers named Mary, over 100 Mary Anns, and about 700 vessels in which Mary is the first word of the name. Next to the Marys come the Elizabeths, Janes, and Sarahs, and then the Williams, which alone of male names exceeds 106. A very large number of the names in the list are Christian; and perhaps next to them is a class of names in which the word Brothers occurs, indicating, doubtless, a partnership in the vessels. There are 80 Brothers (of which 26 hail from one port, St. John, Newfoundland). 42 Two Brothers. 36 Three Brothers. 20 Four Brothers. 7 Five Brothers and Six Brothers, 8 Seven Brothers, 2 Nine Brothers and Ten Brothers. Not only do popular statesmen, members of the royal family, and distinguished generals furnish names, but in the Mercantile Marine List one may see celebrated the last victory, the winner of the Derby, and the sensation of the hour. Ten Gladstones attest the popularity of the present Premier, five Beaconsfields, two Earl Beaconsfields, three Earls of Beaconsfield, and three Lord Beaconsfields commemorate the last. Among the additions of last year was a Lord Wolseley, an Alcestor, and a Tel-el Kebir. The great trial of twelve years ago has traces left in a Dr. Kenealy and a Sir Roger Tichborne; the Ashantee war in a Coomassie, a Black Watch, an Ashantee, and more than one King Koffee; the Zulu war in two Cetywayos, a Rorke's Drift, and a number of Zulus."

INSANE FROM GRIEF.

The Reason of a Maryland Mother Dethroned by the Death of Her Children.

A sad case of insanity, caused by a mother's devotion to her sick children, has just been brought to light at Baltimore, Md., by the removal of the victim to the asylum for the insane. About seven years ago Miss Ella Sherwood, a pretty young girl residing in Frederick County, Md., married a young farmer named James Douglas, of Hartford County. Mr. and Mrs. Douglas located near Pleasantville, and two pretty children were the fruit of their union. About three weeks ago the children aged three and five years, were taken sick with whooping-cough. Mrs. Douglas nursed them, and for days never left their bedside. On Monday she became delirious, and it was thought she would die before her children. On Monday night, about midnight, the youngest child breathed its last, and the next night the oldest child died. The corpses were prepared for burial and placed in the parlor adjoining the bed-room occupied by Mrs. Douglas. The husband of the latter sat up with the corpses on Tuesday, and about midnight Wednesday, becoming exhausted himself from loss of sleep, he went in to a side room and napped for a few hours. He awakened about 3 o'clock next morning and discovered that during his absence from the parlor the dead body of the youngest child had been taken from the coffin and carried away. The occupants of the house were aroused and a search developed that Mrs. Douglas, mother of the children, had during her delirious moments arisen from her sick bed, gone to the parlor, and taken the corpse to an out building, where she was found later with the dead babe clasped tightly to her bosom. Physicians were summoned and she was declared insane. She was removed to an asylum next day.

FOR THE FARMER.

The Canadian Live Stock Trade.

The Canadian live cattle export trade increased from $36,000 in 1877 to $2,500,000 last year, and special efforts are now being made to develop it still further. Prof. Brown, of the Guelph Agricultural College, now in Scotland, is urging the cattle-raisers of Great Britain to transfer the scene of their operations to Ontario, where stock-raising can be carried on at about half the expense involved in England, while thoroughbred stock sells one-third higher than at home. The increase of the Canadian imports has excited the ill-will of some English farmers, who object nearly as strongly to competition with the Dominion as with the United States, and whenever plausible grounds present themselves, charges are made that the Canadian cattle are diseased. Last summer it was alleged that Canadian cattle sold in Cambridgeshire, had foot-and-mouth disease. It has been amply proved, however, that the cattle had been inspected and found healthy before embarkation; that they were subjected to 10 or 12 days' quarantine on board the ship; that they were inspected at Liverpool and declared to be healthy, and that after staying four days there, a clean bill of health was again given. Now as foot and-mouth disease manifests itself within three days of inception, if these animals were really suffering from the malady in Cambridgeshire, they must have contracted it after landing in England.

The Endurance of Australian Horses.

We (Colonies and India) have heard of a man who used frequently to ride from Border Town, in the Tatiara, to Wellington in one day, the distance being say 110 miles, through the desert, the character of the country being heavy in the extreme, most of the way lying through heavy sand. The time occupied was from twelve to fourteen hours; 120 to 130 miles on a good road would have been easier for a horse. Another man rode from Anlaby, near Kapunda, to near Currency Creek, say 100 miles, in about fourteen hours. The same man road from Kingston to Mr. A. M'Farlane's, near Wellington, say 120 miles in sixteen hours without unsaddling. A horse was taken early one summer's morning from Wellington to Poltalock (then Malcolm's station), mustered cattle for some hours, and returned to Wellington at about four p. m., the distance travelled being fully 50 miles. He was then taken by another rider to Adelaide, which was reached between ten and eleven p. m. The only refreshment the horse had on the road was two bottles of porter. The total distance travelled from morning was 115 miles. A rider left the Avenue station about ten a.m., reached the Salt Creek late at night (about ten o'clock), got a fresh horse from the celebrated M. Marsin, and started early the following morning, and reached Adelaide in the afternoon (between four and five o'clock), having ridden about 130 miles the last day. A third rode from Salt Creek south-east, in about twelve hours, having started at midnight, and reached Adelaide before noon next day. He rode the same horse, Percy, who was unmatched for courage, strength and speed, to Mount Barker the same day, the whole ride being about 150 miles. Another severe ride was once done by a native of Sydney, who was one of a party bringing horses down from New South Wales. The horses broke away back on one occasion, and the man galloped for several hours to head them. When he returned to the camp in the evening he was dreadfully exhausted, and could only just ask for a drink of tea, and while he was drinking it his horse fell down dead. The exact distance ridden was not known, but it was reckoned to be considerably over 100 miles. On most of these journeys the horses had little or nothing to eat.

Bones on the Farm.

It is well enough known that bone, when ground fine, makes one of the best and cheapest manures, especially on lands long in use. The needs of farmers with abundant capital are well enough met in the commercial fertilizers. With the Experiment Stations to analyze the samples, there is not much danger of adulteration. The high price of this comminuted bone, two cents a pound and upward, deters many farmers from using it on a large scale, even when there is no doubt that the invesment would pay. In a limited way the small farmer has the means within his reach of reducing several barrels of bone to a fine powder every year. A solution of potash will reduce bone to a fine condition, and make it available for plant food. Most farmers still use wood for fuel, and the ashes from the fifteen or twenty cords used in a year, if saved, would reduce all the bones ordinarily within reach of the farmer. The old-fashioned leach that used to stand at almost every farmer's back door for soap making was a good contrivance for reducing the bones. But any tight, strong cask, or box, will answer quite as well for this purpose. Water poured upon the ashes makes a lye, or solution of potash, strong enough to decompose the bones. The cask should stand under cover, so that the quantity of water applied to the bone and ashes may be under control. The time it will take to reduce the bone to a powder will depend upon the amount of potash in the ashes, and attention bestowed upon the process. It is essential that the ashes and bone should be closely packed in the mass, and that they be kept in a moist state, adding water as it evaporates from the surface. The finer the bone before it is packed in the ashes the sooner it will be reduced. The process can be hastened by putting into the mass a few grounds of common potash. But this is only necessary to save time. Ashes from hickory, or any of the hard woods contain sufficient potash to decompose the bones. When the mass is soft enough to down with a spade or shovel, it can be mixed with land plaster, dried peat or loam, to make it convenient for handling. It is a concentrated fertiliser to be used with discretion in the hill, or applied as a top dressing to growing crops in the garden or field.

We are quite sure that any one who uses this preparation of bone and wood ashes, and sees the vigorous push it gives to garden and other crops, will be likely to continue it. But many farmers near sea ports and railroad stations use coal mainly for fuel, and will have to resort to a hand or horse-mill to use up the waste bones. Small mills are extensively used by poultry men for crushing oyster shells as well as bone, and the machinery can be adjusted to break the bone coarsely for hen feed. The oil and gelatine of the bones have an alimentary value, and turned into eggs, pay much better than when used as a fertiliser for the soil.—American Agriculturist.

SCIENTIFIC.

A fireproof ceiling has been invented. It is composed of tiles supported from joists by hangers, and hanging facing tiles placed on the sides of the joist and top tiles placed between the upper joists. The top tiles and the tops of the joists are covered by a layer of cement, rendering the ceiling secure against fire.

To make plastic carbons for batteries the following receipt is recommended by M. Max Nitsche-Niesky:—Good coke is ground and mixed with coal tar to a stiff dough and pressed into moulds made of iron and brass. After drying for a few days in a closed place it is heated in a furnace, where it is protected from the direct flames and burned feebly at first, then strongly, the fire being gradually raised to a white heat, which is maintained for six or eight hours. The fire is then permitted to slowly go down, and being perfectly cold the carbon is taken out of the furnace.

In Naples a submarine balloon has been invented which will sink people to the bottom of the Mediterranean shore waters, where they can enjoy the natural aquaria there to be seen. It is a balloon of steel, with three compartments—one for the actuating mechanism and floating bladder, one for the captain and one for the passengers, to the number of eight. There are glass windows for looking at the fishes, shells, and weeds, and the height of the balloon in the water is regulated by means of the collapsible bladder. A telephone connects the balloon, which is captive and cannot float away, with the shore or a boat above.

Hitherto it has puzzled eminent surgeons to account for sudden death caused by apparently inadequate wounds in the heart, such as those made by the prick, without penetration even, of a needle. Herr Schmey a student of the Physiological Institute, Berlin, has, however, just discovered that when a needle pricks a certain small spot on the lower border of the upper third of the septum cordis, quite instantaneously the movements of the heart are arrested and forever set motionless in death. "It is now the task of anatomical investigation," says Prof. Kronecker, who verified the discovery of his pupil, Herr Schmey, and communicated it to the Physiological Society of Berlin, "to demonstrate with accuracy this vital centre, the existence of which has been proved experimentally."

Common salt, chloride of sodium, is the most widely-distributed substance, in the body; it exists in every fluid and in every solid; and not only is everywhere present, but in almost every part it constitutes the largest portion of the ash when the tissue is burnt. In particular, it is a constant constituent of the blood, and it maintains it in a proportion that is almost wholly independent of the quantity that is consumed with the food. The blood will take up no more, however much we may take with our food, and, on the other hand, if none be given, the blood parts with its natural quantity slowly and unwillingly. Nothing can demonstrate its value better than the fact that if albumen without salt is introduced into the intestines of an animal, no portion of it is absorbed, while it all quickly disappears if salt be added. The conclusion therefore is obvious that salt, being wholesome, and indeed, necessary, should be taken in small quantities, and that abstention from it is likely to be injurious.

CURE FOR HYDROPHOBIA.

M. Pasteur's Wonderful Discovery of the Efficiency of Inoculation.

The Government has appointed a commission to enquire into the practicability of preventing hydrophobia by inocculation, as proposed by Professor Pasteur.

In an interview with a Figaro correspondent M. Pasteur says:—"I have been devoting the last four years to this subject. I found out, in the first place, that the virus rabique loses its intensity by transmission to certain animals and increases its intensity by transmission to other animals. With the rabbit, for instance, the virus rabique increases; with the monkey it decreases. My method was as follows:—I took the virus direct from the brain of a dog that had died from actual hydrophobia. With this virus I inoculated a monkey. The monkey died. Then with the virus—already weakened in intensity—taken from the monkey, I inoculated a rabbit; with the virus taken from the second monkey I inoculated a third monkey, and so on until I obtained a virus so weak as to be almost harmless. Then with this almost harmless virus, I inoculated a rabbit, the virus being at once increased in intensity.

"Then with the virus from the first rabbit I inoculated a second rabbit, and there was another increase in the intensity of the virus. Then with the virus of the second rabbit I inoculated a third rabbit, then a fourth, until the virus had regained its maximum intensity. Thus I obtained virus of different degrees of power. I then took a dog and inoculated him, first with the weakest virus from the rabbit, then with the virus from the second rabbit and finally with the rabbit virus of maximum intensity. After a few days more I inocculated the dog with virus taken directly from the brain of a dog that had just died of acute madness. The dog upon which I had experimented proved completely insusceptible to hydrophobia. The experiment was frequently repeated, always with the same successful result.

"But my discovery does not end here. I took two dogs and inoculated them both with virus taken directly from a dog that had just died of acute hydrophobia. I let one of my two dogs thus inoculated alone, and he went mad and died of acute hydrophobia. I subjected the second dog to my treatment, giving him the three rabbit inoculations, beginning with the weakest and ending with the strongest. This second dog was completely cured, or rather became completely insusceptible to hydrophobia." M. Pasteur then went to a kennel and caressed a dog that had undergone this latter operation. "Voyez!" said M. Pasteur, "comme il est bien gentil. Whoever gets bitten by a mad dog has only to submit to my three little inoculations and he need not have the slightest fear of hydrophobia."

CAKE PUDDING.—Butter size of an egg, one cup of sugar, one teaspoonsful of creamtartar, half teaspoonful of soda, one pint of flour, fruit.

Burials at Sea.

Perhaps one of the most beautiful sentiments of our fallen humanity, says the Kilmarnock Standard, is that which prompts us to conserve the dust of the dear departed, and to regard their last resting place in God's-acre as a spot peculiarly hallowed. The sanctity of the church is enchanced by the graves of buried love that lie around it, and there is no more fitting preparations for the solemn services of the sanctuary than a meditation among the tombs. As Gray expressed it in his Elegy—

> "E'en from the tomb the voice of Nature cries, > E'en in our ashes live their wonted fires."

Despite the croakings of utilitarians this immorality of love cannot be eradicated from the soul, nor is it desirable that it should be. It has its origin in the self same feeling that animates the patriot, and in those bonds of human affection that forms the very foundation of society. Anything, therefore, that tends to outrage or repress this last solace of the afflicted soul is to be regretted, more especially where it appears to be the outcome of mere wantonness and not justified by actual necessity. Last week we had occasion to chronicle the burial at sea of the remains of Mr. David Hill Dow, a Kilmarnock gentleman, who died suddenly on his way to revisit his native town, and the last rites, strange to say, were performed within two days of the vessel's arrival at Gravesend.

A still more melancholy case is that of Mr. James Hendry, of the National Bank, Patrick, and a magistrate of that burgh, who left his native country recently in the hope of restoring his health by a voyage to America. Sea-sickness, however, struck him down soon after starting, to which he succumbed when the vessel was but four days' sail from New York. The conduct of the ship's officers to his anguished widow, though quite within their powers, has the appearance of being hard-hearted in the extreme. To her piteous pleadings that the body be left on board for the few intervening days they turned a deaf ear; within two hours after decease the corpse was committed to the deep. This haste was surely unseemly and altogether unnecessary, gratuitously adding to the poignancy of the grief of the sole human being on board to whom the dust was dear. In cases of contagious or malignant disease stern necessity must override all other considerations, but in cases such as we have just cited it is surely possible to place the remains in a mortuary on board, convey them to their destination, and hand them over to the sorrowing relatives. Such a provision, on steamships especially, should be easy of accomplishment and the wonder is that things have been tolerated so long in their present unsatisfactory condition.

Law-Made Evils.

And yet the mischiefs wrought by uninstructed law making, enormous in their amount as compared with those caused by uninstructed medical treatment, are conspicuous to all who do but glance over its history. The reader must pardon me while I recall a few familiar instances. Century after century statesmen went on enacting laws which made worse the condition of the debtor—raising the rate of interest "from five to six when intending to reduce it to four," as under Louis XV., and indirectly producing undreamt of evils of many kinds, such as preventing the reproductive use of spare capital, and "burdening the small proprietors with a multitude of perpetual services." So, too, the endeavours which in England continued through five hundred years to stop forestalling, and which in France as Arthur Young witnessed, prevented any one from buying "more than two bushels of wheat at market," went on generation after generation increasing the miseries and mortality due to death; for as everybody now knows, the wholesale dealer, who was in the statute of "De Pistoribus" vituperated as "an open oppressor of poor people," is simply one whose function it is to equalize the supply of a commodity by checking unduly rapid consumption. Of kindred nature was the measure which, in 1315, to diminish the pressure of famine, prescribed the prices of foods, but which was hastily repealed after it had caused entire disappearance of various foods from the markets; and also such measures, more continuously operating, as those which settled by magisterial order "the reasonable gains" of victuallers. Of like spirit and followed by allied mischiefs have been the many endeavours to fix wages, which began with the Statute of Labourers under Edward III., and ceased only sixty years ago; when, having long galvanised in Spitalfields a decaying industry, and fostered there a miserable population, Lords and Commons finally gave up fixing silk-weavers' earnings by magisterial order.

The Luxury of Life in India.

We have no idea of the extreme to which luxury may be carried, says a Calcutta letter. When I say luxury, I have in mind personal helplessness, acquired by long and diligent study. Think of sleeping with a punkah waving over you all night, operated by a tireless coolie, as many of the wealthy people in Calcutta do. Soft-footed Hindoos move noiselessly along the marble floors, their spider limbs concealed in respectable sirongs. Every want is attended to before you can get a chance to help yourself. Even if it is so small a thing as putting on your hat or slippers, opening an umbrella, or washing and dressing in the morning, there is a polite attendant waiting at your side to assist.

To us this multiplicity of servants is, at first, a nuisance. We feel that we might at least be permitted to make our own toilet in peace, and look upon these silent but omnipresent attendants as so many spies. But when we reflect that the servant cannot eavesdrop without a knowledge of the English language, our independent spirit gradually succumbs to the climate, and we at length pass into a languid, dreamy state of acquiescence, accepting the most trivial and petty services from these dusky creatures as though always accustomed to them.

Really help is so cheap here that it seems a pity not to avail yourself of a small army of servants. I have yet to meet a missionary family in the Orient that did not employ at least three or four, who take upon themselves the entire responsibility of the house-work.

Every Wednesday for years Miss Braddon (Mrs. Maxwell) has given a roasted leg of mutton for a dinner to the poor children of a neighboring public school.

MARKDALE JUNE. 12, 1884.

MARKDALE.

A DESIRABE PLACE FOR A RESIDENCE.

According as the country increases in age, the number of farmers and others who will retire from active life will multiply, and while it is right and proper to retire from the care of business and fatigue of hard labor, after devoting the prime of life in diligent toil and habits of economy so that a competency is provided for more advanced years. It is also very important, in retiring, to select a healthy, cheerful locality, combined with social and other advantages. Markdale is looked to already by a number of the above class as a desirable place of residence, some of whom have purchased park lots and are preparing to build, while many others, some from a distance, have this town in view as their home. The place is destined, in the near future to be a very handsome town. We know of no place of its size as well supplied with maple trees which are in themselves a great improvement to the appearance of a place. The situation is high and rolling, and supplied with an abundance of the best of spring water, making it remarkably healthy. Its schools are efficiently conducted, the various churches well attended and liberally supported, while they exist in peace and harmony with each other, the merchants and business men are enterprising and progressive and the societies healthy and vigorous, being also productive of material mutual benefits. The inhabitants comprise the various nationalities which make an industrious, intelligent, social and progressive community, while the surrounding country is a beautiful agricultural district, thickly settled with industrious, intelligent and prosperous agriculturists.

SOMEBODY LIES.

The Editor of the Flesherton Advance shows his fervent desire to injure us in his last week's paper by publishing the following:

"The Editor of the Markdale Standard read a most blasphemous piece on "Tobacco" at the Methodist Church entertainment in Markdale on the evening of the 24th of May. And yet this high-toned editor has the brazen effrontery to preach to others about "respectability," "vulgarity," and "slang!" We like to see a man practice what he preaches; but we do most emphatically detest hypocrites."

The following is the reading referred to, and we ask the public to judge wherein it contains blasphemy:

TOBACCO—A PARABLE.

Then shall the kingdom of Satan be likened unto a grain of tobacco seed, which, though exceedingly small, being cast into the ground, grew and became a great plant and spread its leaves rank and broad, so that huge and vile worms formed a habitation thereon. And it came to pass in the course of time that the sons of men looked upon it and thought it was beautiful to look upon, and much to be desired to make lads look big and manly. So they put forth their hands and did chew thereof. And some it made sick, and others to vomit most filthily. And it further came to pass that they who chewed it became weak and unmanly, and said we are enslaved and can't cease from chewing it. And the mouths of all that were enslaved became foul, and they were seized with a violent spitting, and did spit, even in ladies' parlors and in the house of the Lord of Hosts. And the saints of the Most High were greatly plagued thereby. And in the course of time it came also to pass that others snuffed it, and they were taken suddenly with fits, and they did sneeze with a great and mighty sneeze, insomuch that their eyes filled with tears and they did look exceedingly silly. And yet others cunningly wrought the leaves thereof into rolls, and did set fire to the one end thereof, and did suck vehemently at the other end and did look very grave and calf-like, and the smoke of their torment ascended up forever and ever. And the cultivation thereof became a great and mighty business in the earth, and the merchantmen waxed rich by the commerce thereof. And it came to pass that the saints of the Most High defiled themselves therewith; even the poor, who could not buy shoes, nor bread, nor books, for their little ones, spent their money for it. And the Lord was greatly displeased therewith, and said: "Wherefore this waste, and why do these little ones lack bread and shoes and books? Turn now your fields into corn and wheat, and put this evil thing far from you; and be separate and defile not yourselves any more, and I will bless you and cause my face to shine on you." But with one accord they all exclaimed: "We cannot cease from chewing, snuffing, and puffing—we are slaves."

REV. CHAS. A. NEAL, M.D.

The Editor of the Advance was not present at the entertainment referred to so that one of three things is evident, viz., that he has been mis-informed, or that he does not know the meaning of blasphemy, or that he has made a malicious attempt to injure our moral reputation. If it was either of the former he will doubtless apologise, but if the latter we will not expect an apology.

Forward March.

The circulation of the STANDARD is fast increasing, a greater number of new subscribers being added than at any time since we commenced the business, in the same season of the year, while expressions of a very encouraging nature are coming to us from all sides. Prompted by these facts we have determined to further improve the paper, by adding a hand to our staff which will enable us to devote more time to the paper. We ask our numerous patrons to do what they can in their several neighborhoods in extending its circulation, and on sending items of news for the paper. We are determined to add 200 new subscribers to our list before the 1st September, the larger our list the better we can afford to make the paper, so it will be to the advantage of all our patrons to assist. The balance of 1884 to any address for 50 cents, send in your names at once.

Extension of the T., G. and B. to Wingham.

WINGHAM, June 7.—A staff of surveyors have arrived at Wingham to survey the line to connect Wingham with the Toronto, Grey and Bruce railway at Glenannan. The survey will be completed in a few days. Mr. Noble, chief of the staff, speaks highly of the proposed route and the excellent country, and that the natural situation of Wingham is one of the best in western Canada. Mr. Meyer, the mayor, has not left a stone unturned to get thus far, and has given up a large share of his business to attend to the scheme, which he trusts will be successful.

INVALUABLE TO EVERY LADY!

"MAY DEW"

The Great French Lotion for Beautifying the Face.

It conceals the evidence of age. One application will make the most stubbornly red and rough hands beautifully soft and white. Remember that "MAY DEW" is not a paint or powder that fills up the pores of the skin, and that is injurious to the skin, but a new and great discovery, a vegetable liquid, that causes the cheek to glow with health, the neck, arms and hands to rival the Lily in whiteness. Impossible to detect in the beauty it confers any artificial character. It cures greasy Skin, Freckles, Wrinkles, Pimples, Black Heads, Crow's Feet, Blotches, Face Grubs, Sun Burn, Tan, Ringworm, Chapped Hands, Sore or Chapped Lips, Barber's Itch, Tetter, etc. It frees the pores, oil glands, and tubes from the injurious effects of powders and cosmetic washes. By its use all redness and roughness are prevented; it beautifies the skin, and will make it soft, smooth and white; imparting a delicious softness; imparting a perfectly healthy, natural and youthful appearance. The best face lotion that the world ever produced. We will send "A LARGE BOTTLE" to any address on receipt of price, $1. When ordering mention this paper.

Address all letters to the MAY DEW AGENCY, 167 Church Street, Toronto, Ont. Parlor and Reception Room for Ladies.

MARKDALE Steam Woollen Mill.

The undersigned would respectfully return thanks to their many customers and friends for the very liberal support accorded to them during the past, and would solicit a continuance of the same, as we are now ready to attend to all work intrusted to our care in CUSTOM CARDING, FULLING and WEAVING in first-class style. As we have put on new cards, and made other improvements, we will endeavor to do as good work in the future, if not better, than we have ever done in the past.

Customers wishing to have their wool carded, spun and made into blankets or flannel, on cotton warp, can have their orders attended to by leaving their wool as early as possible.

Please remember the place, Mill Street, west of the Railway Station.

THE ENGLISHMAN.

From a Foreigner's Point of View.

The English have for some time past interfered in French affairs, says a Paris letter to a Boston paper. This has bred in the breasts of Frenchmen a profound hatred of the whole race, and the latest form of this hatred is displayed in a book published a couple of days ago, "Les Malheurs de John Bull," by M. Camille Debans. In some things M. Debans allows his dislike of the English to lead him into exaggeration, but in most his reproaches are, as all people who live in France will readily recognize, more or less justy deserved. The following extract from his book may prove interesting to your readers:

"I am neither a hypocrite nor a diplomatist; and since the word frankness has for its origin the very name of my country, I will declare frankly; yes, I detest the English, I detest them as a government, as a race, as individuals."

"I detest them, first of all, because they hate us cordially and show it on every occasion. I hate them besides because they are cumbersome, because they constantly mix themselves up with what does not concern them at all, because once on the soil of a country that does not belong to them they treat it as a conquered land, because they are not honest either politically, commercially, or humanly, because they are neither polite in England nor in any other country; because, in fine, any relations whatsoever with the English are detestable in our land, in their own land, anywhere and everywhere else.

"Let us look at them in our land.

"The English have spread themselves over every continent, like sardines in every sea, by shoals. In France alone they are legion; there is one shoal of them at Boulogne, one at Dunkirk, one at Fecamp, one at Dinan, one in Touraine, one at Nice, one at Arcashon, etc.

"Whenever a subject of her most gracious majesty shows his horse-teeth in any corner of Europe, that corner no longer belongs to the natives of the country; after that two come, then four, then ten, then a hundred. It is a skin disease which eats around.

"Furthermore, they really exercise a baneful influence upon the French character, in this period of social indolence.

"It is they who have introduced amongst us the politeness of the hat screwed on to the head. No one knows any longer how to salute. Twenty years ago, when a man entered a public place, a cafe, theatre, exhibition, or railway compartment, he took off his hat, and saluted the persons present.

"The English came. They regarded us with an insolent look, and they remained covered. Then certain Frenchmen found that more chic, and this coarseness passed into our customs.

"Formerly, in France, a gentleman offered his arm to a lady, especially when he walked abroad with her. The English did not know this delicate and protecting fashion of accompanying a lady, and even when paying his respects to a young lady, walking like an asparagus stalk by her side, it is no longer good form in him to offer her his arm.

"There is one thing (the introduction of Manchester cloths) which I will never forgive them—these cloths without tissue or weft, and which have brought forth the horrible complete suits at thirty-five francs. If the French had spirit they would form a league, every member of which would engage not to purchase an inch of this cloth, which is as perfidious as Albion itself.

"Meanwhile there exists at Paris tailors who declare with silly pride that they have only English cheviots in their shops. They probably blush at the stuffs of their own country. What is the patriotic eague about?

"Nor will I pardon the English for having invented the ulster. They will not carry it with them to paradise. A people capable of imagining it should be put in the van of nations.

* * * * *

"That is not all, however. Who seize upon the best places in railway trains and steamboats, even when they are retained? The English. With whom are the employes of the French administration civil and complacent—a phenomenon unknown to their compatriots? With the English. Who are they who pass everywhere with stiffness, and who take no account of the usages, nor the regulations, nor even the laws? The English, always the English.

"You should see them at Paris. All belongs to them—the soil, the subsoil, the ambient air. I have heard one of them call the Parisians foreigners. My word of honor!

"At home.

"I will not speak, be it understood, of the relations of the English amongst themselves.

"That does not concern me. What interests me is their attitude with regard to myself when I go to London.

"At Paris I have tortured my brain to guess what they asked of me, and I have done everything to be agreeable to them. On the other hand, as they have not hesitated to stop me in the street and question me, I thought I might act with them in a like manner.

"Oh, yes; I have trustingly addressed people whom I imagined were good-natured and well brought up: 'I don't know. I don't understand.'

"Such are the answers they throw at you, without looking at you, without even pretending to stop. And if, finally, you should manage to get hold of someone who consents to listen to you, he will not understand you. The same people who inquire at Paris for the Rioue Raivole (Rue Rivoli), and who are understood, do not hesitate to send you walking when in place of Leister street, which you ought to pronounce, you say Leicester street, as it is written. There is then a flagrant ill-will. They are disagreeable for the pleasure of being so.

"Certain people, even in France, feel the need of excusing the English, and pretend that if the passers-by do not listen to your questions in the street it is because they are afraid of being robbed. Heavens! ladies and gentlemen, is there then absolutely no one else in London but robbers? I dare not say so.

"Others, also well-intentioned toward the English, inform you, seriously that really they do not understand. What! is that the limit of their intelligence? I dare not believe it.

"But do you want the [illegible] strated to you by themselves? When an islander addresses you in his jargon in Paris, reply to him that it is impossible to catch a word of what he says and speak English to him, as it is not understood in London. You will see if he will not seize all its beauties. Or, better still, do as one of my friends did, who answered a citizen of the United Kingdom: 'I can't tell you because you have not been introduced to me.' If the sons of Albion were treated in this manner for ten years it would smooth their angularities.

"When we are encumbered by them in our own land, oppressed in theirs, robbed a little everywhere by this nation which tends to replace the ancient Jews in the universe, established and assimilated in almost every land, should we not expect in return that they would consent to allow us tranquilly to manage our own affairs—civil, religious, and political?

"Well, no. They can not do so. When we were a powful nation, who allowed no one to tread on our toes without replying by a blow, the sons of free England and their government conveniently kept their place.

"But since the fate of battle has been adverse to us, John Bull, this hero, only imagines the mode of making us feel the burden of defeats which he was incapable of inflicting on us.

"Do we wish to raise our arm? 'Halt!' cries John Bull. Are we tempted to look before us? 'I am opposed to it,' he eagerly cries. We enter into Tunis: 'I don't know if I should permit it.' We were in Egypt; 'Get out of this that I may enter here.'

"We go to *M*adagascar; John Bull is found there all ready to throw Johnstone and Shaw between our feet. And the latter demands 25,000 francs, which are given to him.

"We have a quarrel with Tonquin. John Bull places himself in the path and declares that his interests are compromised if we thrash China. Do we wish to send our criminals to New Caledonia? 'Not there,' cries John Bull, 'the children of the old convicts of Sydney would be compromised.

"We cut the Suez canal. John Bull subsidizes us, and he accomplishes the act of gigantic pocket-picking as a sacred act. It is in the blood.

"Six months ago a French officer purchased lands in the New Hebrides. John Bull, under the form of Commodore Erskine, comes from Australia, causes the sale to be canceled, and France suffers that.

"Eight days ago, a French steamer, La Ville de Tanger, loses a mast and asks the help of an English ship in the Mediterranean to conduct it to a neighboring port. John Bull demanded 125,100 francs ($25,000) for rendering this service, and ruins the ship, which can not pay such a price for three hours' towing! The honest folks! Is there not reason enough in this to execrate the English, that nation which has not one single virtue, which has only interests?

"When they rose up against the slavery of the negro, it is because they had millions of Indians to utilize. Yesterday they overran all Africa to kill the slave merchants, doing battle for the sacred cause of black humanity. But the Soudan revolted, and Chinese Gordon, Gordon Pasha, one of their intensest purifiers, goes off to Khartoum and proclaims the right to hold slaves on the morrow of his arrival.

"I act in the interest of England!" said he to those who were astonished at it.

"O virtue!!!

"Hewett and Graham could not reduce a hero named Osman Digma. At the head of some thousands of other heroes, without rifles or artillery, the latter waits, attacks, shivers and repulses the armies of her majesty. What does Hewett do? He puts a price on the head of his adversary. He sends emissaries laden with gold to sow division amongst his enemies and to purchase troubled consciences. Not having the force to conquer, when they have not a fellow like Arabi in front of them, these brave people foment cowardice, excite greedy instincts, and demand their triumph from the most heartless of treasons.

"Behold the loyalty of these Carthaginians!"

Jews at the Advent of Christ.

You find that nation scattered all over the world; though in it, yet not of it. It was disliked and despised. It was persecuted and down-trodden. In most places it was a mere handful. In no place had it the supreme authority. Numbers, educated opinion, popular prejudice, and state power were all against it and its distinctiveness. Yet it was never crushed, and it was never absorbed; it never ceased to exert power and influence. Low as its fortunes them were no nation was so proud of its history, none was more hopeful of its future. Indeed, it might be said with some truth that at that time the Jews alone had hope. The nations were groaning, as they thought, in the pains of dissolution. Old institutions and old religions were worn out. Men's hearts were failing them for fear, and for looking for those things which were coming of new and better times. The Jews alone thought that the pains they were suffering were not pains of dissolution, but birth pangs, the pangs followed by new life and fresh joy.

And then mark this, for the fact is most important, the Jew's hope is essentially religious. His religion is his distinguished characteristic. Language, Independence, Fatherland, all these he has lost; but the Jew and his religion have been welded together in the hot furnace of affliction. From the time of Antiochus Epiphanes that furnace, though heated seven times more than it is wont, is unable to separate them. No other religion had, at the time of our Lord's birth, any power whatsoever over educated men, or, indeed, more than a superstitious power over the uneducated. It was a strange contrast. Just when the heathen have outgrown their religion, and are casting it away as a childish thing, the Jews grow up to their religion, and embrace it as a rule of faith and life. Whilst the heathen gods are being resolved into mythical heroes, personifications of ideas or of the powers of nature, by the disintegrating process of the thought of the age, the Jew is realizing the presence and the power of the one supreme personal God wherever his lot is cast.

Exquisite fineness of nature is quite compatible with heroic bodily strength and mental firmness; in fact, heroic strength is not conceivable without such delicacy. Elephantine strength may drive its way way through the forest, and feel no touch of [illegible] Atrides would have felt a bent roseleaf, yet subdue its feeling in glow of battle, and behave like men.

RECIPES FROM A HOUSEKEEPER'S NOTE-BOOK.

DANDY POTATOES.—Cut medium sized potatoes in quarters and drop in boiling lard fry same as doughnuts. A nice breakfast dish.

FOR HOMINY FRITTERS, take two teacups of it: and stir a small cup of sweet milk and a little salt with it, and one egg, four tablespoonfuls of flour, with half a spoonful of baking powder. Have your frying-pan ready with the fat hot in it; drop this batter in by spoonful, and fry a delicate brown.

FOR MRS. W.'S WHITE MOUNTAIN CAKE, take one cup of butter, beaten to a cream, with two cups of sugar; add one cup of milk, three cups of flour, with two teaspoons baking powder mixed with it and the well-beaten whites of five eggs. Flavor with lemon and put strawberry jelly between.

QUAKER BREAKFAST PUFFS are made by taking three eggs, one teaspoonful of sugar, one coffee cup of sweet milk, one cup of warm water, three tablespoonsful of yeast, a salt-spoon of salt, flour enough to make a stiff batter. Leave the whites of the eggs until the batter has risen, then add them. Set the puffs to rise the night before, and they will be very light and fine.

GRILLED OYSTERS.—On a very fine, wide gridiron, (or one made of wire net used for screens), place some some slices of fat pork, cut as thin as possible, on each slice lay a good sized oyster, or two small ones; broil and serve hot, with fried parsley.

ENTREE FOR ROAST PORK.—Peel as many potatoes as will cover the bottom of a big pie-dish. Sprinkle a half teaspoonful of dried sage over them. Cut an onion in thin slices and spread them over this. Add salt and pepper and lumps of butter. Cover the bottom of the dish with water or milk, and bake in a moderate oven.

CARROT ENTREE.—Scrape ten small carrots and put in a saucepan with three ounces of butter. Let them simmer gently; when they have cooked for fifteen minutes add some salt and pepper, a small onion and a teaspoonful of parsley chopped fine. When the carrots are tender, drain the butter from them and serve hot. Serve them with roast beef.

FIG SAUCE.—Soak the figs in water, or better still, in a little sour cider, all night. Then boil them gently until tender. Just before taking them from the fire, add sugar to your taste, and the juice of a couple of lemons to prevent the sauce from tasting insipid.

MACARONI AND TOMATOES.—Use instead of water to cook them in, some soup stock; allow half a dozen tomatoes of medium size for half a pound of macaroni. Boil the macaroni, which you have broken in small bits, and when it is almost tender, add the peeled and sliced tomatoes. Season well with pepper and salt.

ONE-EGG TEA-CAKE.—A little more than half a cup of butter, one cup and a half of sugar, one cup of sweet milk, one egg, three cups of flour, one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in a very little hot water, and two teaspoonsful of cream of tartar sifted with the flour; one cup of raisins chopped very very fine.

PUDDING SAUCE WITHOUT BUTTER.—Scald a teacupful of sweet milk, then add a coffee-cupful of pulverized sugar that has been wetted with the yolks of two fresh eggs. When the sauce is thick as custard, take it from the fire. When it is cool, add flavoring and the whites of the two eggs, having beaten them to a stiff froth.

TENDERLOIN ON TOAST.—Cut pork tenderloin in very thin slices; stew them in a little water till they are nearly done; then put a little butter in a saucepan, and fry them till light brown; serve on buttered toast and raw tomatoes sliced thin.

SMOTHERED CHICKEN.—Prepare the fowl as for roasting, and cook in a pot of boiling water until tender. When within about twenty minutes of being done, add a teacup full of rice, which will cook in the gravy. Add parsley, pepper and salt, and serve the fowl on a dish with the rice around it.

FRIED APPLES AND BACON.—Core and slice round, without paring, some tart, well flavored apples. Cut into thin slices some middlings of excellent bacon or pork, and fry in their own fat almost to crispness. Take out the meat and keep hot while you fry the apples in the fat left in the pan; add a little sugar to taste. Drain an lay on the slices of meat.

CRANBERRY PUDDING.—Pour boiling water on a pint of bread crumbs; melt a table spoonful of butter and stir in. When the bread is softened add two eggs and beat thoroughly with the bread. Then put in a pint of the stewed fruit, and sweeten to your taste. Bake in a hot oven half an hour. Fresh fruit of many kinds can be used instead of the cranberries. Slices of peaches put in layers are delicious.

BOILED POTATOES.—Have ready some cold boiled white potatoes left from the previous day. Cut them in slices less than a half an inch thick. Dip each slice in melted butter, and dust with cracker crumb, and boil over a a fire. Arrange on a pot dish, putting a tiny bit of butter on each slice, and sprinkle with a little finely chopped parsley or celery. Garnish with water-cresses.

CHICKEN HASH.—Mince cold, roast or boiled chicken, but not very finely, and to a cupful of meat add two tablespoonsful of good butter, a half cup of milk, enough minced onion to give a slight flavor, and salt pepper and mace to taste. Stew it, taking care to stir it, and serve daintily with a garnish of parsley. Every particle of bone must be subtracted.

GELATINE APPLES.—Peel and core the apples, leaving them whole; put in a kettle and boil, adding a slice or two of lemon, a little green ginger and sugar. Cook the apples until tender. Take them up carefully, boil down the syrup, and add two tablespoonsful of gelatine which has been dissolved in four spoonsful of water to a cup of this syrup. Pour this over the apples, and set where the whole will cool.

VEAL OR MUTTON CUTLETS WITH TOMATO SAUCE.—Take half a can of tomatoes (selecting the most solid part) and stew them twenty minutes with a little parsley, two cloves, pepper and salt. Put a teaspoonful of butter in a clean saucer over the fire, and when it reaches the bubbling point, add a large teaspoonful of flour. Mix this smoothly, and when thoroughly cooked, add the tomatoes, which must first have been passed through a sieve; stir the sauce well. Broil quickly over a hot fire half a dozen nice veal or mutton cutlets. Arrange them on a hot platter, and pour the tomato sauce around them. The dish should be served smoking hot to be good.

FUNNIGRAMS.

Bulwer was correct. There is no such word as fail—it is mollified down into assignment.

"Mercy on me, what are those horrible sounds upstairs?" "Oh, that's nothing but dear George. I suppose he has lost his collar stud again."

Profanity never did any man the least good. No man is richer, or happier, or wiser for it. It commends no one to society; it is disgusting to the refined, and abominable to the good.

The sermon of the best preacher in the world will not make as much impression upon a congregation as the sudden pattering of rain on the window panes of a church containing two hundred summer bonnets.

"What's in a Name?"—(Scene—A schoolroom. Teacher (to junior geography class—Where is the Soudan? Small boy—In Ireland. Teacher—Ireland! Oh, dear no! What made you think it was there? Small boy—Becus a' the pigs come fre there.

An old negro and his son called on the editor of a newspaper. "I wants my son ter work in your office, sah." "What can he do?" "Oh, at fust he can't do nothin but edick yer paper, but after a while, when he learns mo' sense, he can black yer boots an' sweep de flo."

An old woman in the Calton of Glasgow was told by her son, a sailor, that the "Glen" Line, in which he had sailed, made the longest stretch known, going so far as China. "I dinna ken hoo far that may be," answered his mother; "but I'm gey certain that the "Claes Line stretches far, for it gangs frae pole to pole."

A good story is told of a young married man who, during his "courting days" was very bashful. One day he was invited to attend a tea-party at the house of a pious uncle of his sweetheart, and when seated at the table the good hostess requested him to ask a blessing, which so "broke up" the already bewildered young man that he unconsciously stammered out, "I don't care for any, thank you."

"Jenny, lass!" once said a late Provost of his royal burgh of Rutherglen, "ta' the hen cot o' ma hat, for I'm gaun to sit in judgment the day on the Magistrates' bench." A stranger calling on this same dignitary one day, deferentially uncovered his head in his presence, on which the sensible Provost said, "Keep on your hat, ma man! I'm just mortal like yersel, altho' I'm Provost o' Ruglen."

"Don't sit so near the window, darling," said a spoony young German bridegroom to his bride on their wedding tour; "let us try to keep the carriage all to ourselves. Some jackanapes is sure to get in if he sees your pretty face!" The same speaker, thirty years later: "Move up to the window, old woman, so that we may have the compartment to ourselves; you will frighten all the other passengers away, you know."

There may be sweeter music than a mother singing to her child, but it is never heard on earth:—

"Go to shlape me babby,
Shet yer eyes to wanst—
Yer the image of yer daddy
Go to shl——

Arrah, ef yer don't shet yer two eyes an shtop yer howlin' thish blessed minnet, I'll wring the neck o' ye—ye cross little brat." Yes it is very sweet.

A clergyman writes—"There is generally a considerable sameness about the comic things that comes out of answers to examination papers; but this, which I came across the other day, is quite new to me. The question was—"Give the narrative of the tribute money, and the lesson we can learn from it." The answer—"They brought a penny to our Lord, and he said, 'Whose subscription is this? Give it to Cæsar;' the lesson being that rich people ought not to put coppers on the plate."

How to make the Hands Soft and White.

I am a believer in that kind of pride that makes a woman careful of her hands, for a pair of beautiful, well-kept hands is a delightful possession. Unfortunately, Nature has not favored us all with well-shaped hands; still, with reasonable care and attention, we can make such hands as we have had given to us, white, soft, and more shapely. When a girl, I sorely grieved over my ugly stubs of fingers—broader at the ends than at the base—and could glean but faint comfort from grandmother's oft repeated saw, "Handsome is that handsome does." To begin; the hands and nails must be kept scrupulously clean. Use soft water, not too cold or too hot, and good soap. A few drops of ammonia or a pinch of borax will soften hard water and make it pleasant to the skin. The hands must be thoroughly dried before going into the air, and sudden changes of temperature should also be avoided. Glycerine, vaseline, cream, mutton tallow, or a paste of fine oat-meal, honey, and the white of an egg, whichever agrees best with the skin, well rubbed in, and a pair of gloves worn over night, if persevered in, will do much towards making red, rough hands white and smooth. Fine white sand, corn-meal, oat-meal, or a piece of lemon will remove dirt and stains. After the hands have been thoroughly washed, press back the skin from the base of the nails, so that the "half moon" can be seen, and, if necessary, scrape or cut away the superfluous parts; trim the nails to the same shape as the ends of the fingers, only a trifle longer, and rub with a bit of chamois until a high polish is attained. When the hands and nails have once been put in order, it will take but a short time each day to keep them looking nice, and I, for one, think the time well spent.

The Russian Priest.

Every parish priest in Russia is obliged to be a married man; that is to say, he must have a wife as a preliminary condition to the possession of a parish, he must be married before he has been ordained priest, for a priest cannot marry. Formerly the rule of a parochial clergy was enforced so rigorously that when a priest's wife died the widower had to resign his benefice and betake himself to a convent. This rule worked so cruelly, especially in the case of children thus suddenly bereft of both parents, that it was relaxed in the late Emperor's reign, and now a widowed priest may retain his parochial charge. The parish clergy, however, are still a caste and a despised caste. In social standing they are little above the peasantry. They are never met in the drawing-rooms of the gentry.

DO HEARTS BREAK?

A Physician's Testimony on this Cause of Death.

"A healthy man or woman does not die of a broken heart," a well-known physician said. "A healthy heart is only a big muscle, and nobody can have grief enough to break it. When, therefore, [illegible] widow shows apparently inconceivable grief at the death of her husband, and in a short time recovers her equanimity, she ought not to be accused of hypocrisy. Neither should it be concluded that another widow who pines and dies has more affection for her husband than the first. The first widow may have more affection than the other, but may have been sustained by physical health.

"It is erroneous to suppose that death from heart disease is always sudden. It is often protracted for years, and exists undetected by most skilful physicians only to be developed by some sudden occurrence. The late [illegible] was an eminent physician at Brooklyn, who died within an hour of the time when he was about to lecture. He was so well that after examination by a skilled physician for a first-class insurance company, he was declared perfectly sound, and a policy of a thousand dollars insurance on his life received his house before his body was cold. The cause of death was a mystery until the post-mortem examination showed that a little piece of some chalky deposit in the heart had become loosened and formed an embolus. The man had simply taken some specimen out of his desk, and died in his chair without any excitement or undue effort. Any undue excitement might have done it, and the cause of death would have been cited as that from a broken heart.

"So-called deaths from broken hearts may be frequently treated in this way. Any exertion as well as another may furnish the requisite culmination. Medical books are filled with instances of death from various diseases during the performance of physiological functions. When a man is nearing death it is easy to put on him the finishing touch, but it is inaccurate to give the finger that touch all the blame of death. If a woman loses her husband or a girl her lover, and nervous exhaustion, loss of sleep, loss of nourishment and grief weakens the action of the heart, she is said to die of a broken heart, but she has, in fact, died of a very ordinary disease.

"The case of Bill Poole, living for days with a ball in his heart, is often spoken of as remarkable, but Dr. Flint records a case where a man had a ball in his heart for twenty years, and finally died of pneumonia. Both these men had healthy hearts, and could not have had them broken by grief. Another record showed that in sixty-two cases of rupture of the heart there was fatty degeneration existing. In other words, where fat is substituted for muscle, the heart might be easily broken. If any of these people had been subjected to sudden grief they might have furnished illustrations of heart-breaking. One medical observer records one hundred cases of rupture of the heart where there was no grief to account for it. In fact, grief is a very rare cause of heart-breaking.

"Disease is the real cause of heart-breaking, and the various kinds of disease which lead to it are so many that volumes would be necessary to describe them. The causes of these diseases are manifold, and are very much under the control of the individual. There are, of course, hereditary tendencies to heart disease; but, aside from traumatic causes, these tendencies may exist for years without fatal result. It is a curious fact that the least dangerous disease often excites the most apprehensions. Frequently patients who have only a functional or organic disorder will not be persuaded that the case does not impend, although there may be no real danger. On the other hand, dangerous diseases may exist unsuspected. The sympathetic relations between the nerves of the heart, and disorders of the heart are frequently traceable to mental excitement, either pleasurable or painful. Quickening of the heart is no certain symptom of danger. It has been demonstrated that the pulse may safely range from one hundred to one hundred and forty for a great many years.

THE TERRIBLE FATE OF [illegible] CARSON.

A Pretty Girl Eaten by Wild Beasts in North Carolina Backwoods.

From the North Carolina backwoods some twenty or thirty miles away, comes a terrible story. Henry Carson, his daughter, Kitty, lived in the wilds of Watauga County, half a dozen miles from any human habitation. Old man Carson raised tobacco and cotton sufficient to support his household with the necessaries of life, and all the spare time he spent hunting bear and other game.

About three weeks ago Miss Kitty disappeared, and there were ugly rumors in the air to the effect that she had eloped with a young man from Murphy, who had been frequently seen in those parts and with whom it was known Carson had a "grudge" of some kind. When he [illegible] was asked what had become of his daughter girl, he simply remarked that he supposed "she had skipped." Shortly after this he was tramping through one of the [illegible] nameless swamps of the county, following some bear tracks, when a sight met his eyes that transfixed him with horror. In the depression of the swamp from which the water had recently receded, were the remains of a human body, the entire upper part of which above the waist had been eaten away by wild animals. From the remains of clothing Carson recognized all that was left of his daughter.

Crazed with grief, he carried the news to the nearest settlement, and a party of neighbors assisted him to bring the mangled remains home. It is supposed that poor Kitty became entangled in the mire and was unable to extricate herself, and, that, while in thus utterly helpless position, bears or other animals had killed her and devoured much of the body as then remained above the water. Evidences of a severe struggle were present in the trampled-down grass and torn and bloody clothes. The discovery created a great sensation, and her father is thought to be hopelessly insane from grief.

The girl's funeral was the occasion of one of the largest gatherings ever within Watauga County.

Scandal, when it has truth in it, is a grease spot on new cloth, but when there is no truth in it it is like a splash of mud which will come off easily when dry.

It would sound strange to say the [illegible]omen of the ballet" or "the women of the [illegible]ps diplomatique;" but it would sound [illegible]ually strange to say "a virtuous lady" or [illegible]pretty lady." The French Academy is [illegible]ded on to draw the line and lay down [illegible]s for the correct use of the disputed [illegible]m.

[illegible]A mulatto girl with a remarkable pretty [illegible] peculiar face was engaged by a shrewd [illegible]astern showman. He had a tooth extracted [illegible]rom each side of her mouth, and inserted [illegible]air of long tusks, covered her ears with [illegible]se ones like a beast's, bleached and tang[illegible]her abundant hair, and instructed her [illegible]utter an unintelligible jargon. Thus she [illegible]s transformed into a valuable curiosity, [illegible]ther wages of $15 a week did not satisfy [illegible]. On the arrival of the show in Indian[illegible]olis she attempted to quit it, and a row [illegible]sulted in an exposure of the fraud,

[illegible]A good amateur actor carried a satchel in[illegible]Baltimore groggery and displayed con[illegible]ts that seemed to be money to the am[illegible]nt of $25,000, at the same time pretend[illegible]to be demented. The [illegible]n was eagerly advanced by the saloon [illegible]an, who, of course, intended to keep the [illegible], in which he subsequently found nothing [illegible]d worthless paper.

[illegible]From twenty to fifty thousand would seem [illegible]o be the rightful population for the worship [illegible]ful French city on the hill or beside the [illegible]er which still keeps the name of the Gallic [illegible]e which dwelt there in the days of Cæsar. But [illegible]ew exceptional great cities are among [illegible]e oldest cities of the land, whose import[illegible]ce has never left them, like Lyons and [illegible]arseilles. The most remarkable case of a [illegible]odern town springing into importance is [illegible]t. Etienne, but in Lancashire and York[illegible]re, Eng., there are twenty St. Etiennes.

[illegible]There is a gleam of hope for those who [illegible]nt to go to Europe without the ocean [illegible]urney. It is proposed that a railway shall [illegible]e constructed along the Pacific coast to the [illegible]extremity of Alaska, where a ferriage would [illegible]nnect the tourists with the Russian rail[illegible]ay system, which would be extended to [illegible]the Siberian side of Behring's Strait. As [illegible]the strait is only forty-five miles wide be[illegible]tween East Cape and Cape Prince of Wales, [illegible]the distance in a swift steamer would be [illegible]trifling even for the victims of seasickness. [illegible]Parlor cars transferred to the steamers might [illegible]not at present be overpowering, and the [illegible]item of snow ploughs and snow sheds would [illegible]figure noticeably in the expenses. Still, the [illegible]scheme as perhaps as promising as that of [illegible]going to Europe by balloon.

[illegible]It may be interesting to bee masters at [illegible]this season of apiarian activity to know that [illegible]a Jonas de Gelieu, a pastor at Neufchatel, [illegible]Switzerland, in a work translated into Eng[illegible]lish long ago, under the title of "The bee [illegible]preserver; or, Practical Directions for Pre[illegible]serving and renewing Hives," affirms [illegible]that when two or three distinct hives are [illegible]united in Autumn they are found to consume [illegible]together scarcely more honey during the [illegible]winter than each of them would have con[illegible]sumed singly if left separate." In proof of [illegible]this singular result the author sets forth a variety of experiments, all of which led uniformly to the same conclusion. He shows positively that of upward of thirty hives six had their population thus doubled, and consumed no more provisions during winter than a single hive, and that, so far from the bees suffering any diminution, the doubled hives generally sent forth the earliest and best swarms. The translator of M. Gelieu's work, states that he practised in Scotland most of the plans recommended in the original publication with the same effect.

The Migration of Swallows.

Just before they leave Britain the swallows assemble in vast numbers every evening; they are very noisy, and seems to be consulting as to their future proceedings. The course which they follow from the island has been ascertained with tolerable accuracy. They cross the Channel to the French coasts; then they proceed southward through Spain until they come to the Straits of Gibraltar, and so cross the narrow sea into Algeria. Those which come from the northern part of the Continent seem to arrange themselves into three divisions. One takes the same track as the English birds. The second chooses a central route, enters Italy and crosses to Corsica by means of Elba, Monte Christo, and other small Islands that can serve as resting places. From Corsica they pass through Sardinia, and reach Africa by way of Tunis. The third division traverses the whole of Italy, passes into Sicily, and thence crosses to North Central Africa. It is stated that a gentleman residing at Prague caught a swallow before migration, and fastened a small white ribbon with the word "Bohemia" written upon it. In the following spring the bird came back bearing another ribbon with "Hispania" upon it. It is stated that a gentleman who lived at St. Omer captured on April 26, a swallow which had a label attached to its leg, on which was written "Tunis, April 25, 1882." Now, the distance in a straight line from Tunis to St. Omer is about 1100 miles, and the question was naturally raised as to the capability of the bird to travel so great a distance in twenty-four hours. In answer to this question it was stated that a pigeon had been known to fly from Bordeaux to Paris—about three hundred miles—in seven hours, and therefore it would be possible for the swallow to traverse 1100 miles in twenty-four hours.

The History of Coke.

The history of the discovery of coke and the development of the traffic has never been written. Authentic information of the first use of coke in this country places it in 1817, when it was employed by Col. Issaac Meason, one of the earliest founders of Western Pennsylvania, in refining iron at the Plumsock, or Upper Middleton mill, a few miles from the Youghjogheny river. In 1818 the use of coke was attempted by blast furnaces, but it had to be abandoned because the blast was too light, being only five pounds to the square inch. Even when the value of coke as a furnace fuel was fully appreciated, the enjoyment of its advantages was prevented by inability to increase the blast. In 1835 William Firmstone manufactured good gray-forge iron at the Mary Ann furnace, in Huntingdon county, with coke produced from Broad Top coal. It the same year F. H. Oliphant, of Fairchance furnace, near Uniontown, exhibited at the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia, samples of iron made from blue limy ore melted with coke. In 1840 the Great western Iron Works, at Brady's Bend, built four coke furnaces. In 1841 2, coke was made on the banks of the Youghjoghenyriver and shipped in flat boats to Cincinnati. A gentleman who is well informed in all the details of the coke business says that Dud Dudly, an English iron manufacturer of the sixteenth century, is entitled to the discovery of coke He used it for the same purpose to which it is applied now, smelting. The manufacture of coke in Connellsville region did not rise to the dignity of a business until toward the close of the decade of 1850, when it was carried on principally at Dawson's Station, on the Youghiogheny river, six miles below Connesville, by the Cochrans, who are still in the business, and to most of whom it has brought great riches.

A Rustic Humourist.

His humour is quick, he is on the alert for a joke, and is not easily caught napping. He has the heart of a romancer, and throws wayward fancies and strange words into his speech. He keeps one in surprise, and is quick in getting out of a difficulty. We asked him, as loud as we could talk, "How many crows had he killed;" but his deafness was of service, and he looked calmly as if we had made an ordinary remark about the weather; and he mumbled, as he bended slowly down, and adjusted himself in the chair. "A fellow's glad o' rest after herding these auld vermin a' day long. Eh, but it's been a bonnie day!" Then we tried him on another tack, and made sure he would hear my next question. 'Who scares the crows when you go to dinner?" The ancient looked up in a half dazed state, then his blue eyes played with rustic merriment, and he emitted a croaking sound as if chuckling at his forthcoming remark when he said, "Oh! of course the crows gang hame to their dinner too!" He chuckled at his humour, and spread his horny dust-stained hand in front of his face, and said apologetically. "A fellow mun whiles say something for nonsense. Man, twirling one's finger a' day long soon gets terrible tiresome."

A Rattlesnake at a Disadvantage.

Last Sunday Mr. and Mrs. James Halford, accompanied by their 2-year-old child, visited John Carhart, of Spring Creek precinct. During the afternoon their attention was attracted to the child, who was tugging and pulling at some object with all his strength. Going toward him his mother was horrified to find that the little one had both hands tightly grasped about the tail of a venomous rattlesnake, just above the rattles, whose furious rattling gave notice of the reptile's anger. While the child was pulling the snake was unable to get in position for striking with his fangs. In an instant the frightened mother comprehended the deadly danger of her child, and, with a frantic scream that caused the little one to drop his deadly plaything, she caught him up and sprang away. When released the snake instantly coiled himself to strike. It was indeed a narrow escape.—Hebron (Nev.) Journal.

It is stated that the Princess Alice was the most original thinker among the Queen's children, and made her family nervous by her freethinking tendencies, but after the death of her child she returned to the Church.

On May 13 the German Reichstag passed by acclamation the bill for granting the sum of $33,750 to Dr. Koch and the other members of the Cholera Commission, as a reward for their brilliant discoveries in Egypt and India.

Henry Irving says that President Arthur would shine in any society, that he has a large acquaintance with the best literature, dramatic and general, is apt at quotation, an excellent story-teller, a gentleman, and a good fellow.

In Russia the heir to the throne comes of age at 16, and is then usually placed in charge of some distinguished person especially in the confidence of the Czar. It is thought that Count Adlerberg, who held a high position in the late Czar's household, will be selected now.

Presidents Grevy and Arthur and Queen Victoria were toasted at the banquet given in honor of Minister Morton and ex-Minister Noyes, a short time ago, by the Ramblers' Club of Paris, and M. De Lesseps made a speech in which he expressed approval of the method of educating young girls in America.

The most successful prime donne in London at present are Americans; an American tenor and an American baritone are coining gold there, an American lady has taken Sadler's Wells Theatre, with promise of success, while Mary Anderson and Lawrence Barret are winning golden opinions, Minnie Palmer is triumphant, and even Lotta is succeeding.

Jules Verne is off to the Mediterranean on board his yacht, the St. Michael. He will visit Oran, Algiers, Rome, Tunis, Malta, the Ionian Islands, Sicily, Naples, and Rome. The journey is to be performed strictly on business, as the scene of Verne's forthcoming novel is to be laid in these districts.

A memorial on behalf of the Tichborne claimant is being got up in the House of Commons. It prays that he my be released from prison, and at the same time be relieved from the inconvenience of a ticket of leave, his period of servitude having now nearly expired. It also asks that Arthur Orton, now alleged to be a lunatic at Paramatta, shall be brought to England at the expense of the State.

There is a negro graduate at Havard this year—Robert Hebberton Terrell, a Virginian, and the son of slave parents. He went to college as a waiter, and at that time was illiterate; but some of the white students took a fancy to him, and helped him through a preparatory course, after which he supported himself by teaching a Boston class of negro boys.

M. Meline, the French Minister of Agriculture, has been inspecting the maritime Alps district, with engineers, with a view to the construction of irrigation canals and the reafforesting of the valleys. He goes actively to work, maintains a strict incognito, and positively refuses all banquets, official receptions, &c. This has made a very good impression on the people in the districts visited.

M. Jundt, a very eminent French painter, who was in the front rank of his profession, financially prosperous, and a great social favorite, has committed suicide. He was unmarried, suffered from gout, and had no one to take care of him but the concierge. Sitting at the window of his apartment in the Rue d'Assas, Paris, smoking a long pipe, it appears to have suddenly occurred to him that life without the enjoyments he had been accustomed to was not worth living. He jumped out and was picked up dead on the pavement.

A French Verdict.

Accustomed as one is to the sentimental verdicts of French juries when there is a lady with a grievance and a bottle of vitriol, or a revolver, in the case, the recent acquittal of an Aisne farmer's wife who was tried for the murder of her husband strikes one as a specially gross miscarriage of justice. Mme. Luce seems to be a jealous and vindictive woman, and her husband's conduct was eminently calculated to keep her jealousy continually on the rack. His nights, in particular, he devoted to "frog-fishing"—a pretext which never imposed on Mme. Luce. One night she knocked at a female neighbor's door with a loaded gun in her hand. The pair went to a wood near the house, where they presently perceived at some little distance another couple, whom in the moonlight Mme. Luce took to be her husband and one of her rivals. She fired at the pair at once killing one and dangerously wounding the other. The dead man proved to be her husband; his companion was his own nephew. For once Luce really was engaged in the sport which he had so often used as a cloak for his peccadilloes, and had taken his nephew with him. The jury acquitted the prisoner without leaving the box.

WHAT TO DO.

If troubled with an unhealthy, slow-healing sore use McGregor & Parkes' Carbolic Cerate. You will find it invaluable for healing, cleansing and completely removing your trouble. If the Blood is out of order, take with it a few doses of McGregor's Speedy Cure from Hill Bros. J. & J. 1

A distructive fire occurred in the most thickly settled portion of the city of Winnipeg Tuesday morning, property to the estimated value of thirty-five thousand dollars being consumed.

Feaver colic, unnatural appetite, fretfulness weakness, and convulsions, are some of the effects of worms in Children; destroy the worms with Dr. Low's Worm Syrup.

The Hectic Flush, pale hallow cheeks and precarious apetite, indicate Worms. Freeman's Worm Powders will quickly and effectually remove them.

Tompsett and Lawder, sentenced to death for the murder of Peter Lazier at Bloomfield on the 21st of December last, were hanged Tuesday morning at Picton. They both protested their innocence to the last.

The township agricultural grounds at Clarksbury have been enlarged.

National Pills are sugar coated, mild but thorough, and are the best Stomach and Liver Pill in use.

The Orangeville Gazette reports an increase of new subscribers of 119 in one week. Clever.

THE EFFECTS OF WHISKEY.

The effects of whiskey are always evil, and those who feed upon alcoholic stimulants, vainly endeavoring to cure coughs and consumption, but nurse a viper. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam is a remedy that is always reliable for all throat bronchial and lung troubles, and never does harm to any one.

The Republican Convention at Chicago nominated Blaine for President and Logan for Vice-President.

CURE FOR DEAFNESS.

As numerous testimonials will show, there is no more reliable cure for deafness than Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It is also the best remedy for ear ache, sore throat, croup, rheumatism, and for pains and lameness generally. Use externally and internally.

The Grand Lodge of the Canadian Order of Odd Fellows met in Hamilton this week. About 130 delegates are expected. Dr. Cameron, of Owen Sound, Grand Master, will preside. There is but little other than routine work to be transacted.

FRAUDULENT TRANSACTIONS.

There are many frauds perpetrated in medicine, and many advertised remedies worse than useless. Not so with Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It remains as ever the best internal and external medicine for all pain, soreness and injuries with which human flesh is afflicted.

Blaine, in a speech some time ago, said that while he did not beleive in the annexation of Mexico to the United States, he thought the annexation of Canada could not come too soon.

A LIFE SAVING PRESENT.

Mr. M. E. Allison, Hutchinson, Kan.: Saved his life by a simple Trial Bottle of Dr. King's New Discovery, for Consumption, which caused him to procure a large bottle, that completely cured him, when Doctors, change of climate and everything else had failed. Asthma, Bronchitis, Hoarseness, Severe Coughs, and all Throat and Lung diseases, it is guaranteed to cure. Trial bottles free at A. Turner & Co's Drug Store. Large size $1.00. 1

"My dear boy," said a lady to a precocious youth of sixteen, "does your father design you to tread the intricate and thorny paths of a profession, the straight and narrow ways of the ministry, or revel in the flowery fields of literature?" "No, marm; dad says he's a-going to set me to work in the tater-field."

WHAT IN A NAME?

Scrofula is so called from the Latin scrofa, a pig, from the supposition that the disease came from eating swine's flesh. It is often inherited from parents, and leades to abscesses, ulcerous sores, debility, king's evil and consumption. The case of the Rev. Wm. Stout, of Wiarton, who suffered 23 years from scrofulous abscesses, is one of the most remarkable on record. Burdock Blood Bitters cured him after the best medical skil had failed.

The unwillingness to do honor to a prophet in his own country is illustrated in the following anecdote: It was remarked to a Scotchman once that certain individual was very clever. "Him clever! Why, I gaed tae schule wi' him!" was the response.

HOW TO CURE A COLD.

Take some gentel opening medicine, bathe the feet in warm water, adding a spoonful of mustard; remain indoors; equalize the circulation with warm bath and friction; drink warm gingar tea, and take Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, the most perfect and the safest cough cure that can be procured.

A CELEBRATED CASE.

The remarkable case of W. A. Edgars, of Frankville, who suffered from disease of the liver and kidneys so badly that all hope of recovery was abandoned. He remained ten and thirteen days without action of the bowels. Four bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters restored him perfect health, which he had not known for twenty years before

BUCKLEN'S ARNICA SALVE.

The best Salve in the world for cuts, bruises sores, ulcers, salt rheum, fever sores, tetter, chapped hands, chilblains, corns, and all skin eruptions, and positively cures piles or no pay required. It is guaranteed to give perfect satisfaction, or money refunded. Price, 25 cents per box. For Sale by A. Turner & Co.

Last winter reports from the different States showed that in nearly all of them, while the weather was not so steady as in Ontario, there was greater extremes of cold, the thermometer registering often lower in the Southern States than in Toronto. During the late cold dip considerable damage was done by frost in some parts of Ontario, but in parts of New York State ice formed three-quarters of an inch thick. At Hanover, N. H., the ground was frozen solid, and in other places in that State there were several inches of snow. That is a worse record than any part of settled Ontario can show. Evidently the idea that the climate becomes more unbearable with every inch toward the north is wrong. The people of the States immediately south of Canada look upon this county as a land of everlasting cold. The people of southern Ontario look upon the unsettled part of the province to the north in much the same way. Perhaps time will show that they too are mistaken.

IMPORTANT CHANGES.

There are two periods in the life of every female when the system undergoes great changes. First the change from childhood to womanhood; next, that of womanhood to old age. These are the critical changes of life, and the system should be nourished and regulated by that matchless tonic, Burdock Blood Bitters. It is invaluable in all diseases peculiar to females.

The Walkerton Post Office is to be removed to a more central portion of the town.

THE SECRET OUT.

The secret of beauty has been at last revealed. Without good health, pure blood and a fair clear skin none can possess good looks. What is more repulsive than pimples, blotches and a sallow or pasty complexion? Burdock Blood Bitters reveal the fact that all can gain pure blood and freedom from the repulsive diseases of the skin that result from impurities.

AN ANSWER WANTED.

Can any one bring us a case of kidney or liver complaint that Electric Bitters will not speedily cure? We say they can not, as thousands of cases already permanently cured and who are daily recommending Electric Bitters, will prove. Bright's disease, diabetes, weak back, or any urinary complaint quickly cured. They purify the Blood regulate the bowels, and act directly on the diseased parts. Every bottle guaranteed. For sale at 50 cents a bottle by A. Turner & Co., Markdale. 1

Mr. John P. Gilford of Durham has been appointed a notary public.

A FACT.

There are oils white, and oils black.
Put up in bottles short and tall,
But Hagyard's Yellow Oil, for pain,
Is the very best oil of all.

It cures rheumatism, neuralgia, deafness, sprains, bruises, contracted cords, sore throat, frost bites, burns and all soreness of the flesh. It is for external and internal use.

If Blaine should try to annex Canada, the american bank manager cashiers who have found a refuge here would oppose it with all their might, unless it were stipulated that all American refugees should be pardoned.

DANGER IN THE AIR.

The recent strange planetary movements and electrical phenomena have developed the fact that the earth is passing through a dangerous period when atmospheric influence will seriously effect human health. Fortify the weakened system with that grand tonic regulator, Burdock Blood Bitters, and avoid malarial blood poisons.

Whose profession is at once the hardest and the easiest? The musician's; because he works when he plays and plays when he works.

SAVED FROM THE SCALPEL.

A Toronto lady, Mrs. Berkenshaw, contracted a disease of the knee joint and was advised to submit it to a surgical operation by the best physicians attending; all other treatment having failed, when Hagyard's Yellow Oil was tried and speedily effected a cure. It is the unfailing remedy for accidents and emergencies, and is for external and internal use.

REMARKABLE RESTORATION.

Mrs. A. O'Brien, 372 Exchange Street, Buffalo, was supposed to be lying with consumption and abandoned by her physician. She suffered terribly and was reduced in flesh to ninety pounds. In this condition she resorted to Burdock Blood Bitters, and now enjoys perfect health and weighs one hundred and forty-six. She will gladly answer inquiring sufferers on receipt of U. S. postage stamp.

TOWN HALL, GLENELG.
June 2nd, 1884.

Council met pursuant to adjournment, and formed into a Court of Revision, all the members, the Reeve in the chair, minutes of former meeting read and confirmed. The assessment roll was further amended as follows:—John H. Hunter, assessed as tenant for lot 57, con. 2, E. G. R. William Jenkinson, assessed for lots 7 and 8, con. 3, N. D. R. instead of C. Firth. George Peart, assessed for lot 7. con. 8, jointly with Mrs. Peart. James Skemmons, assessed for lot 16, and north half of 17, con. 2, E. G. R. M. Sweeny, struck off the roll for lot 9, con. 10. Part of west side of lot 4, north of Mill St., Markdale, assessed to James R. Trimble, at $1,200, and stock at $1,000, total $2,200, having been ommitted by the Assessor.

Moved by Mr. McMillan, seconded by Mr. McCuaig—That the assessment roll as amended be now finally passed and certified to by the Clerk.—Carried.

The roll was certified to accordingly.

After the Court of Revision the Council took up the general business, all the members present, the Reeve in the chair, minutes of former meeting read and confirmed. The Treasurer presented a statement of the financial condition of the township, showing the amount invested to the credit of the Railway By-law No. 171. When it was moved by Mr. McMillan, seconded by Mr. Dunsmore—That having examined the statement of the Treasurer, called for at last meeting in reference to debenture account, and sinking fund, on account of By-law No. 171 and the general financial standing of the Township, we are pleased to find that said statement is of a very satisfactory nature, showing a deposit in Bank of $5889.43, and also holding a debenture on the Town of Durham for $400 bearing interest at 6 per cent., and that the Treasurer deserves the thank's of this Council for the manner in which he has guarded the interests of the Township in his management of the sinking fund and all matters connected with his office as Treasurer—Carried.

McCuaig—McMillan—That the Reeve and Mr. Dinsmore be a Committee to repair bridge at Chaffy's mills.—Carried.

Neil—McMillan—That a special grand of $20 be given towards repairing crossway at lot 10, con. 4, N. D. R. the commissioner for Ward No. 2, to complete the work from his Ward appropriation.—Carried.

McMillan—Neil—That the following amount be appropriated for repairing roads in the different Wards, vis., Ward No. 1, $100; Ward No. 2, $100; Ward No 3, $120; Ward No. 4, $100.—Carried.

The Assessors were paid $40 each, and 2.50 each for distributing notices of appointments to office, accounts were paid as follows: N. McIntyre, $1.72; James Burnet, $9.02; Thos. Whitmore, $4.43, for supplies to S. Cope and wife indigents; C. W. Rutledge, $41.78 for printing, and municipal blanks; A. H. N. Jenkins, $3.50, printing; Ffed. McLaren, $1.75, repairing scraper; Alex. Livingston, $3.00, removing obstruction off road; the Clerk, $37.50, for quarter's salary and $2.53, for postage and stationary.

By-law No. 224 to amend By-law No. 221, was passed through all its stages, signed sealed and engrossed on the minutes.

Neil—McMillan—That all road contracts be paid for by cheques at the Council meetings.—Carried.

On motion the Council adjourned to meet on Monday, July 21st at 10. a. m.

J. S. BLACK, Clerk.

A Witness for the Defence.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.—CONCLUSION.

To say that there was a "sensation" would feebly describe what followed. Every one in court sprang to his feet. The prisoner looked as if he had seen a ghost. There was a perfect hubbub of voices, as bar and jury talked among themselves, and my brethren at the solicitors' table poured questions upon me—to none of which I replied. Silence being restored, the voice of the judge—grave and dignified, but with a perceptible tremor—descended like vocal oil on the troubled waves of sound. 'Who instructs you, Mr. Clincher?'

"Mr. Bentley, my lord."

The judge looked more astonished than ever. My name was familiar enough to him as a judge, and he had known it even better when, as a leading barrister, he had held many a brief from me.

"I am persuaded," said he, "that a gentleman of Mr. Bentley's repute and experience has good reason for what he does. But so extraordinary and unheard-of—— I will ask Mr. Bentley himself if he really considers that duty requires him to offer himself as a witness, and when and why he came to that conclusion?"

"My lord," I replied, "I am certain that, believing what I have had cause to believe within the last five minutes, I should be greatly to blame if I did not testify on oath to certain facts which are within my own knowledge. But if the prisoner chooses to call me as a witness, your lordship will presently understand why it is that, with all submission, I cannot at this moment, or until I am in the box, give my reasons. And I must add that the value of my evidence to the prisoner will greatly depend on his answers to certain questions which I wish, with your lordship's sanction, to put to him in writing. And if he answers me as I expect, I believe my evidence will put an end to the case against him."

"Really, gentlemen of the jury," said his lordship, "this matter is assuming a more and more remarkable aspect. I hardly know what to say. That a prisoner on trial for his life should answer questions put to him in private by the prosecuting solicitor is the most extraordinary proposal I am bound to say, which ever came under my notice. It is the more difficult for me to decide because the prisoner has not the advantage of counsel's assistance.—Prisoner, is it your wish that this gentleman should be called as a witness on your behalf? You have heard what he has said about certain questions which he wishes to put to you beforehand. Of course you are not bound to answer any such questions; and may nevertheless call him. What do you say?"

"I am in God's hands, my lord," answered the prisoner, who was quite calm again. "It may be that He has raised up a deliverer for me—I cannot tell. But I know that it He wills that I should die, no man can save me; if He wills to save me, nought can do me harm. So I am ready to answer any questions the gentleman wishes."

"I propose," said the judge, "before deciding this extraordinary point, to consult with the learned Recorder in the next court."

All rose as the judge retired; and during his absence I escaped the questions which assailed me from every side by burying myself in a consultation with my counsel. When he heard what the reader knows, he fully upheld me in what I proposed to do; and then threw himself back in his seat with the air of a man whom nothing could ever astonish again.

"Si-lence!" cried the usher. The judge was returning.

"I have decided," said he, "to allow the questions to be put as Mr. Bentley proposes. Let them be written out and submitted to me for my approval."

I sat down and wrote my questions, and they were passed up to the judge. As he read them, he looked more surprised than ever. But all he said, as he handed them down, was, "Put the questions."

I walked up to the dock and gave them into the prisoner's hands, together with my pencil. He read them carefully through, and wrote his answers slowly and with consideration. With the paper in my hand, I got into the witness-box and was sworn.

My evidence was to the effect already stated. As I described the man I had seen under the lamp, with my face averted from the prisoner and turned to the jury, I saw that they were making a careful comparison, and that, allowing for the change wrought by twelve years, they found that the description tallied closely with the man's appearance.

"I produce this paper, on which I just now wrote certain questions, to which the prisoner wrote the answers under my eyes. These are the questions and answers:

"Question. Were you smoking when you came up to the corner of Hauraki Street?—Answer. No.

"Question. Did you afterwards smoke?—Answer. I had no light.

"Question. Did you try to get a light?—Answer Yes, by climbing a lamp at the corner; but I was not steady enough, and I remember I broke my hat against the cross-bar.

"Question. Where did you carry your pipe and tobacco?—Answer. In my hat.

"Those answers," I concluded, "are absolutely correct in every particular. The man whom I saw under the lamp, at eight o'clock on the night of the murder, behaved as the answers indicate. That concludes the evidence I have felt bound to tender." And I handed the slip of paper to the usher for inspection by the jury.

"Prisoner," inquired the judge, "do you call any other witness?"

"I do not, my lord."

"Then, gentlemen," said the judge, turning to the jury, "the one remark that I shall make to you is this—that if you believe the story of the prisoner's witness, there can be little doubt but that the prisoner was the man whom the witness saw at the corner of Hauraki Street at eight o'clock on the night in question; and if that was so, it is clear, on the case of the prosecution, that he cannot have committed this murder. I should not be doing my duty if I did not point out to you that the witness in question is likely, to say the least, to be without bias in the prisoner's favour, and that his evidence is very strongly corroborated indeed by the prisoner's answers to the written questions put to him. Gentlemen, you will now consider your verdict."

"We are agreed, my lord," said the foreman.

"Gentlemen of the jury," sung out the clerk of arraigns, "are you all agreed upon your verdict?"

"We are."

"And that verdict is?"

"Not guilty."

"And that is the verdict of you all?"

"It is."

There followed a burst of cheering which the usher could not silence, but which silenced itself as the judge was seen to be speaking. "John Harden—I am thankful, every man in this court is thankful, that your trust in the mercy and power of the All-merciful and All-powerful has not been in vain. You stand acquitted of a foul crime by the unhesitating verdict of the jury, and most wonderful has been your deliverance. You go forth a free man; and I am glad to think that the goodness of God has been bestowed upon one who has repented of his past sins, and who is not likely, I hope and believe, to be unmindful of that goodness hereafter.—You are discharged."

Had he been left to himself, I think the prisoner's old master would have climbed into the dock, with the view of personally delivering his servant out of the house of bondage. But he was restrained by a sympathetic constable, while John Harden was re-conveyed for a short time to the jail, to undergo certain necessary formalities connected with his release from custody. I volunteered to take charge of Mr. Slocum, and took him to the vestibule of the prison, overwhelmed during the short walk by thanks and praises. We were soon joined by Harden, whose meeting with his master brought a lump into the throat even of a tough criminal lawyer like myself. I saw them into a cab, and they drove off to Mr. Slocum's hotel, after promising to call on me the next day, and enlighten me on certain points as to which I was still in the dark,

As strange a part of my story as any, has yet to be told. I had hardly got back to my office and settled down to read over the various letters which were awaiting my signature, when my late client (Harden's prosecutor) was announced. I had lost sight of him in the excitement which followed the acquittal. He did not wait to learn whether I was engaged or not, but rushed after the clerk into my room. He was ashen white or rather gray, and his knees shook so that he could scarcely stand; but his eyes positively blazed with wrath. Leaning over my table, he proceeded, in the presence of the astonished clerk, to pour upon me a flood of abuse and invective of the foulest kind. I was a swindling thief of a lawyer, whom he would have struck off the rolls, &c.; until I really thought he had gone out of his mind.

As soon as I could get in a word, I curtly explained that it was no part of a lawyer's duty to try to hang a man whom he knew to be innocent. As he only replied with abusive language, I ordered him out of the office. The office quieted itself once more—being far too busy, and also too well accustomed to eccentric people to have time for long wonderment at anything—and in an hour I had finished my work, and was preparing to leave for home, when another visitor was announced—Inspector Forrester.

"Well, Mr. Forrester, what's the matter now? I'm just going off."

"Sorry if I put you out of the way, sir; but I thought you'd like to hear what's happened. The prosecutor in Harden's case has given himself up for the murder!"

"What?" I shouted.

"He just has, sir. It's a queer day, this is. When I heard you get up and give evidence for the man you were prosecuting, I thought curiosities were over for ever; but seems they ain't, and never will be."

"How was it?"

"Well, he came into the station quite quiet, and seemed a bit cast down, but that was all. Said fate was against him, and had saved the man he thought to hang in his stead, and he knew how it must end, and couldn't wait any longer. I cautioned him, of course—told him to sleep on it before he said anything; but make a statement he would. The short of it all is, that the idea of murdering the old lady for her money had come into his mind in a flash when he saw that poor drunken fool exhibiting his knife in the tavern. He followed him, and picked his pocket of the knife, and then hung about the house, meaning to get in after dark. Then he saw the girl come out and go off, leaving the door closed but not latched, the careless hussy! Then in slips the gentleman, and does what he'd made up his mind to—for you see the old woman knew him well, so he couldn't afford to leave her alive—gets the cash and slips out. All in gold it was, two hundred and fifty pounds. When he heard that Harden couldn't be found, he got uneasy in his mind, and has been getting worse eve since, though he did well enough in trade with the money. Seems he considered he wasn't safe until some one had been hanged. So, when he recognised Harden, he was naturally down on him at once, and was intensely eager to get him convicted—which I noticed myself, sir, as of course you did, and thought it queer too, I don't doubt. He took too much pains, you see—he must employ you to make certain, instead of leaving it to us; whereas if he hadn't come to you, your evidence would never have been given, and I think you'll say nothing could have saved the prisoner."

It was true enough. The wretched man had insured the failure of his own fiendish design by employing me, of all the solicitors to whom he might have gone!

I learned next morning, how Harden, after trying in vain to light his pipe on that memorable evening, had wandered for hours through the hard-hearted streets, until at daybreak he had found himself in the docks, looking at a large ship preparing to drop down the river with the tide. How he had managed to slip aboard unseen and stow himself away in the hold, with some idea of bettering his not over-bright fortunes in foreign parts. How he had supported his life in the hold with stray fragments of biscuit, which he happened to have in his pockets, until, after a day or two of weary beating about against baffling winds, when they were out in mid-channel, the usual search for stowaways had unearthed him. How the captain, after giving him plenty of strong language and rope's-end, had at length agreed to allow him to work as a sailor on board the vessel. How on landing at Sydney he had gone into the interior, taken service with his present master—under another name than his own, wishing to disconnect himself entirely with his former life—and by honestly doing his duty had attained his present position.

By the light of this narrative, that which had puzzled me became perfectly clear—namely, how it was that he had contrived not only to get so entirely lost in spite of the hue and cry after him, but also to remain in ignorance of his aunt's fate.

My client was tried, convicted, and executed in due course; his plea of guilty and voluntary surrender having no weight against the cruel and cowardly attempt to put an innocent man in his place.

When I last saw John Harden, he was married to a serious lady, who had been his late master's housekeeper, and was possessor of a prosperous general shop in a country village, stocked by means of money which Mr. Slocum had generously left him.

MEXICO'S GRAND PALACE.

Where Thousands of Human Victims Were Slaughtered.

The "Palacio Del Gobemo" of republican Mexico was built by its kingly oppressors. This magnificent structure, occupying an entire square 675 feet in length, built around half a dozen interior patios, or open courts, was commenced by the Aztecs and finished by Cortez and his Spanish vice-royal successors. It is situated in the east side of the square, which is south of the cathedral. This square is the most beautiful in the city, being laid out after the European fashion, ornamented with flowering shrubs and encalypius trees and adorned with statues by the unfortunate Carlotta. This is also the place where the famous Teocoli, or sacred place of the Aztecs, was situated, and where at least twenty thousand of human victims were annually slaughtered. Passing in at the central entrance of this building, where dusky soldiers were walking their beats, many others "off duty" were lounging around giving it more the appearance of a monarchial palace than a republican capitol, we saw before us the central patio or court. It is about one hundred feet square, surrounded by large, heavy stone pillars, thirty feet high, supporting on its round-headed arches a magnificent balcony. This also being faced with arches produces a very imposing aspect. Here we were introduced to the officer of the day, who kindly showed us the interesting parts of the palace.

An opportunity was here afforded us for seeing Maximilian's carriage of state, concerning the magnificence of which so much has been said. As the guard opened a heavily-locked door our eyes fell upon a carriage of great splendor, at least ten feet high and twenty feet long, ornamented with rich gildings covering all the wood-work, figures of cherubs, arms of Mexico, surmounted by heavy silver-work and eight very large panels of plate glass. These are thick enough to deflect a rifle ball not striking it perpendicularly, and even then the only danger there would be from the pieces of broken glass. The inside was trimmed with rich white damask and silver braid. This elegant carriage, drawn along the pasoe with its prancing steeds, with uniform drivers, liveried footmen, and the royal personage clad in rich robes of state, was designed to impress the lovers of parade and show.

A magnificent flight of stone stairs, twelve feet wide, leads up from the patio to the main rooms in the second story. Going up this stairway we find the offices of the republic. The president and the secretaries of the army and navy have offices here. Here also is the hall of the senate, and above on the roof the central meteorological observatory with the best telescope in Mexico.

We passed through several ante-rooms in which were huge marble vases, exquisite in workmanship, with the arms of Mexico upon them. This coat-of-arms, which was also painted on the window shades, consists of an eagle with extended wings sitting on a cactus plant and contending with a serpent. It is the old symbol of the Aztecs.

We then came to the ambassador's hall, three hundred feet long and twenty-five wide. This room is lighted by fifty candelabra and six very large chandeliers covered with crystal pendants. It is also arranged so as to be capable of division into smaller rooms by means of crimson curtains.

Mexico has sought to impress its own history on its foreign ambassadors by putting on the walls of this pantheon the portraits of its republican heroes. First comes Hidalgo, an insurgent priest, who was killed while endeavoring to secure the liberty of Mexico. His portrait is accompanied by that of another priest, Morales; then Guerrero; Iturbide, who attempted to become emperor; Juarez, the famous Indian president; Diaz, who is likely to become president again next June; Mina Arista, who was prominent in the negotiations that brought the war with the United States to a close, and lastly, another priest, named Matamoras. One American has been admitted to this hall—namely Washington. In this hall is a large painting twenty-seven feet long, showing the battle of Puebla, on the Cinco de Mayo, when the Mexicans, defeated the French. It is to be remembered that in this battle, when the national existence was at stake, the Mexicans, especially the Indians, fought with more courage than ever before. At one side of the painting is a bust of Gen. Largo oza, the leader of the Mexicans in this battle.

Thus this imposing room is designed to preserve the important facts and factors of the history of the republic, to immortalize, its Mexican heroes, to stimulate patriotism, and insure the devotion of all observers to the future welfare of the state.

Sunday in Paris.

The Sabbathlessness of Paris strikes a stranger oddly and painfully; the ear and brain wait for the recurring seventh-day lull in the noises of the week, but it does not come. The rattle of business carts and the rumble of drays, the cries and calls of it inerant vendors, the hammering and pounding of masons and carpenters, go on without intermission; the one voice which is unheard is the sound of church-bells. I tried to get a notion of the system and statistics of attendance on public worship and cessation of labour on Sunday in Paris, but could come to no conclusion as to whether there is a general custom in either or not. There are so many services between six in the morning and one o'clock, with vespers and the benediction later in the afternoon that the whole working population might attend them by detachments without causing any apparent pause in the toil. There was one tribute to the day which could be noticed even from an upper window—a greater display of clean blouses—but whether this was in recognition of its sacred or its festive character I cannot say.

When a man has meant anything strongly, there's never any real going back again for him. It isn't the failure or the success, it's the purpose, the will that is in him, that makes the difference.

"Truth" Bible Competition.

NO. ELEVEN.

THE FINAL ONE.

Closing September 15th.

A NEW PLAN.

For Persons Residing Anywhere in the World Outside the City of Toronto.

The Largest List, and Most Valuable Ever Offered by Any Publisher.

Residents of Toronto Inadmissable.

A SMALL FARM FREE.

Special Club Offer.

Four Pianos, Three Organs, Silver Tea Sets, Sewing Machines, Gold Watches, Silver Watches, and Innumerable Other Valuable Rewards.

Don't Delay Sending in Your Answers.

At the solicitation of many friends TRUTH announces one more—the final—Bible competition. Owing to the fact of so many valuable rewards going to citizens of Toronto, this competition will be open only to persons living outside the city of Toronto. Any one residing in any other part of the habitable world will be eligible to compete for these magnificent rewards. The questions—which are supplied by an eminent Presbyterian minister—are very difficult, but the rewards are valuable. Everything offered in previous competitions has been promptly and cheerfully handed over to the successful ones the moment they are known. Full and complete lists of all those who gain rewards are given in TRUTH the week following the close of each competition. There will be no change, and no postponement in any way; everything will be carried out exactly as stated.

HERE ARE THE QUESTIONS.

1.—Where is the first reference in the Bible to the day being divided into hours?

2.—What is the superficial area in cubits or square feet of the largest bedstead mentioned in the Bible?

3.—What evidence have we that in Bible times women were often employed in the manufacture of bread and sweetmeats?

Every one competing must send two dollars with their answers, for one year's subscription to TRUTH. And aside from the rewards, themselves, they will find that they have made the best investment of two dollars they ever did. TRUTH is full and big value for the money. Bear in mind that you pay nothing extra for the privilege of competing for these costly rewards, and you will get TRUTH for twelve months in any case for your two dollars, which is the regular subscription price, and will also get one of these rewards, provided your answers are correct, and reach TRUTH office in time Don't delay.

The further you live from Toronto the better you can compete for these last or consolation rewards. Bear in mind that it is the last correct answer received at the office of TRUTH that gets number one of these consolation rewards. The office is open only till the 15th September, and as long as your letter bears postmark, where mailed, of the date of 15th September, it will take its place in the order received at TRUTH Office. Fifteen days after date of closing will be allowed for letters from distant points to reach Toronto, but don't forget that your letter must not bear a later postmark than September 15th. All competitors must send with their answers two dollars for one year's subscription to TRUTH, which, however, will be sent to any desired address for two months. Wherever you live, outside Toronto, you can compete at any time between now and the closing day for either the first or middle rewards, and as well as, of course, for the consolation rewards. Some one will get those five acres of land—why not you? Look up your lists now and see if you can find the answers to the questions. It will do you good, apart from the opportunity you have of obtaining a valuable reward in addition to TRUTH, which alone is good value for the two dollars. It contains 28 pages of choice and pure reading matter for the home circle—something to interest every member of the family. The publisher could not afford to give these valuable rewards unless he was certain of your patronage in return. Come, and you are almost certain to become subscribers to TRUTH if you take it for one year, it is such a splendid weekly (not mere) magazine.

SPECIAL CLUB OFFER.

If twenty-five persons join and send each one of the twenty-five whose answers are correct will get their choice of a solid-gold brooch, new and elegant design, worth retail two dollars; a Chambers' Etymological Dictionary, worth about same amount; World's Universal Cyclopædia, or a volume elegantly bound of Shakespeare's Complete Works. Of course, each of the club will have the same opportunity of gaining one of the rewards in the regular list (in addition to certainty of one of the prizes aforesaid), though they had sent in singly. This is simply an extra inducement to clubs.

The rewards in last competition were widely scattered over Ontario and Quebec. In fact, every province was represented in the last, not excepting British Columbia. A good many also went to the States.

No information will be given any one beyond what has above been stated. So don't waste time by waiting, but send in your answers and money now. If you happen to be too late for the first, you may be for more enough to obtain a middle reward, and there where the biggest ones are. TRUTH directs special attention to the fact that clergymen are not permitted to compete, neither are persons who in previous competitions won prizes exceeding one hundred dollars in value, and no Torontonians are allowed to compete. The field is now open for a fair and square race for these rewards to any one, on the habitable globe, outside Toronto. No money will be received by telegraph, or in any way but through the postoffice or by express. Two dollars only required. Try your skill. You are sure of good value for your money anyway. Address S Frank Wilson, TRUTH Office, 33 to 35 Adelaide street, Toronto, Canada.

A Sure Remedy for Neuralgia.

Neuralgia is one of the most common and distressing complaints incidental to this climate. It is not confined to any particular season, for while most general in the winter seasons, yet many suffer its excruciating agony in the heat of the summer. In late years this form of disease has become better known, and consequently the means of relief have become greatly increased in number as well as efficacy. Among the most powerful and penetrating combinations, placed within the reach of the public for the relief of neuralgia, we can mention no remedy equal to or more certain than Polson's NERVILINE. Its power over pain is simply thing wonderful, and we advise a trial for neuralgia, or any other painful complaint. Nerviline is sold by all druggists at 25 cents a bottle; also trial bottles at 10 cents.

Two little children in Bath, New York, whose parents were about to celebrate their an anniversary of their marriage, were overheard discussing the event. The elder had been out in the carriage with his mother delivering the invitations, and was telling the little sister what was soon to occur. The little girl heard him with great interest, and then asked, earnestly, "And can us go to she's party?"

The Mad Czar.

Paul I, was known among his subjects, and to the universe, as the Mad Czar. It was the policy of Count Pahlen, his favorite, and afterward the ringleader of his assassins, to make his master appear as insane as possible; he encouraged him in his vagaries. There never was a man more uncertain, and capricious, possessed alternately by the fiends and the angels; in one moment he would be found consigning, without any obvious cause, the noblest of his subjects to disgrace and exile; the next you might see him with tears in his eyes benignly bending over some wounded soldier in the military hospital. As the years went on these latter moods of tenderness became fewer; he grew suspicious, bitter, and restless, the unhappiest man in his vast empire.

Shortly after Paul's accession to the throne he arrogated to himself omniscience and infallibility. He could not be deceived and he could not be mistaken. By intuition he detected the sins and thoughts of his courtiers, who, indeed, found it lucrative to invent their designs against the state on the plea that darkness could not hide them from Paul, occasionally inventing misdemeanors when they were at a pinch for real ones. The plea of innocence of any crime of which the Czar charged you headed the list of crimes. Infallibility fitted Paul to be an authority in all departments of life and thought. Theology, war, man millinery, philology, church ritual, etiquette, millinery, architecture, education, felt in turn the touch of his reforming hand. By ukase he evangelized the lapsed masses of Russia in a day, filling the churches with worshippers, and the confessionals with penitents whose devotion and remorse were ... by visions of the knout; the local authorities were instructed to march the reputed libertines of their districts to church in procession between two rows of soldiers.

The issue of an imperial decree forbidding the wearing of round hats, frock coats, vests without sleeves, and pantaloons were supposed to be a means of gratifying a grudge he bore toward Englishmen. His aversion to rounds hats seems to have been constitutional. It was more expedient that the sinful garment should be proscribed than that the tranquility of a czar should be disturbed. The sudden apparition of in the streets of St. Petersburg announced the new decree; wherever a round hat appeared it was snatched by ambushed policemen, and the muscular pedestrian who ventured to repel the assault and knock down the thief was carried before the court and ... The combative Englishman was of course the chief actor in these street broils. By the influence of Sir Charles Whitworth the ukase, so far as it affected foreigners, was modified; the chief of the police was instructed not to confiscate the head dress, but to detain its wearer till evidence was produced that he was not a Russian either by birth or naturalization. Paul's hatred of hats was of old standing. While Grand Duke and living at Gatschina, he saw a workman wearing one. He caused the man to be brought before him, and administered him a lecture on his indecent attire. Turning to the Grand Duchess, Paul asked for some pins, and raising the flaps of the round hat, transformed it into a cocked one and ordered the workman to wear it so, till it was past service. The ukase caused a run on the shops for head dresses that were not a civil offense; and as the stock was soon exhausted, people had to walk the streets bareheaded, or batter their hats into another category. An ambassador who ventured to laugh too loudly at these eccentricities had his passports returned. Paul paid the dress of Englishmen the compliment of a special police decree. The costume he enjoined was a three cornered hat, a long queue with a curl at the end of it, a single-breasted coat and vest, buckles instead of strings at the knee-breeches and the shoes. On one occasion, seeing one of the hated race wearing long boots, he sent some policemen to cut them into the size of shoes; but the man refused to be reformed, they pulled the boots off and left him to go home in his stockings. It is written somewhere that a lady at court provoked the imperial displeasure by wearing her hair too low in the neck, and that as a punishment she was ordered into close confinement and fed on bread and water. Again, an English merchant was dragged from a sledge and cane... in the street for wearing too thick a cloth. The inhabitants of St. Petersburg fled in all directions when they saw the imperial carriage in the distance, only to be pursued by mounted Cossacks who brought them back, and before his Majesty. A short-sighted Englishman, who pleaded defective vision when asked why he had skulked down a back lane was ordered to use spectacles. He was known in the capital ever afterward as "the Englishman who wore spectacles by ukase." The costume of cabmen was not beneath the Czar's notice. he wanted them among other things, to shave their long beards. As many of them objected to part with a single hair, the struggling culprits had to be held by one police official while another shaved them. The method of harnessing horses was also regulated by law; the new law made the fortunes of the saddlers of the capital, "Ten days were allowed the gentry and gentry to provide themselves with the prescribed equipments; after which the traces of every carriage harnessed in the forbidden fashion were cut; for a time the streets were littered with disabled vehicles. Then after silence reigned; the crack of the whip and the voice of the coachman were unheard till the new caparisons were ready. Another ukase swept the the streets of the aristocracy and fashion of Russia; it was that which revived prostration. As the imperial carriage passed, the pedestrian had to kneel down on his knees, and the equestrian and charioteer to alight and do similar homage, amid the snow and slush and mud, or the vengeance of an autocrat overtook the traitor who neglected his duty. When the Czar held a drawing room, the subject who did not imprint a resonant kiss on the imperial hand, or whose knee alighted gingerly on the floor, was taught by a cuff that was that reverberated through the hall needed to certify to the genuineness of the adulation and genuflection.

Paul's horses were admonished and chastised if they forgot the respect due to their rider. Once he convened an extempore court of justice on the street to try a horse that had just stumbled with him; the horse--the ridden one--was sentenced to receive fifty lashes, and after the castigation was rebuked by the riding one: "That, sir, is for having stumbled with the Emperor." While ... his ... in one of his uncontrollable fits of anger, he accidentally struck the branch of a lustre and broke it. Indignant at the lustre interposing itself as an obstacle in his way, he attacked it in right earnest and beat it to powder. His reply to General Damouries is worth reproducing. The general having absented himself from court one day, Paul asked him if he had been unwell. "No, sire; but one of the most important persons of your court having asked me to dinner, I could not refuse him."

"Sir," replied the Czar, "I would have you know that there is no person of importance here except me and the person I am speaking to, and he only so long as I am speaking to him."

The Righi Railway.

The Righi Railway, on the Lake of Lucerne may be referred to as a marvel of railway enterprise. To make a line to the summit of a mountain, 5000 feet high, could certainly have been no ordinary undertaking. This railway, was opened in the year 1871, the terminus being at Vitznau, also the point of landing for steamers. The railway goes in an almost continuous and direct line five miles long, not as might be imagined by a zigzag route up the mountain, the view of the surrounding country extending in interest as the heighth increases. The route includes an inclined tunnel, 325 feet long, and a girder bridge across the Schnurtobel Gorge. An extension of four miles from Kaltbad has been added to the original line, proceeding along the ridge of the mountain, 5280 feet above the level of the sea. The line, which is a single one with a five feet gauge, consists of three rails; the centre one is fitted with cogs. In other words, the middle rail is a ladder up which the engine climbes by means of cogwheels fitted below the floor. The engine has a very remarkable appearance, resembling very much a huge black bottle, and when on level ground it leans on one side as if about to fall. When ascending the incline the engine assumes an upright position. Only one carriage is attached; this is ten feet wide and somewhat resembles our tramway cars. There are nine seats placed transversely, arranged to accomodate fifty-four passengers.

In ascending, the carriage is propelled instead of being drawn, but in the descent the locomotive precedes the carriage, and acts as a powerful break. The train proceeds at a rate of about eight miles an hour. Great care is necessary to ensure the road being kept in order, hence each mile of the line is under the superintendence of a man whose sole duty is to precede the trains and remove obstructions. The Righi has been described as a mass of pudding, with millions of stones for plums; the danger is lest any of these stones should accidently get into such a position as to prevent the proper working of the cog-wheel on the engine. A journey of this railway is looked upon by many as quite an adventure. Timid folks are advised to sit in the middle of a seat, so as avoid the sight of the gulf and precipices over which the line runs.

Rainbows.

The oldest historic reference to the rainbow is known to all: "I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth. . . And the bow shall be in the cloud; and I shall look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon earth." To the sublime conceptions of the theologian succeeded the desire for exact knowledge characteristic of the men of science. Whatever its ultimate cause might have been, the proximate cause of the rainbow was physical, and the aim of science was to account for the bow on physical principles. Progress toward this consummation was very slow. Slowly the anicents mastered the principles of reflection. Still more slowly were the laws of refraction dug from the quarries in which nature had imbedded them. I use this language, because the laws were incorporate in nature before they were discovered by man. Until the time of Alhazan, an Arabian mathematician, who lived at the beginning of the twelfth century, the views entertained regarding refraction were utterly vague and incorrect. After Alhazan came Roger Bacon and Vitellio, who made and recorded many observations and measurements on the subject of refraction. To them succeeded Kepler, who, taking the results tabulated by his predecessors, applied his amazing industry to extract from them their meaning--that is to say, to discover the physical principles which lay at their root. In this attempt he was less successful than in his astronomical labors. In 1604 he published his "Vitellio," in which he virtually acknowledged his defeat, by enunciating an approximate rule instead of an all-satisfying natural law. The discovery of such a law, which constitutes one of the chief corner-stones of optical science, was made by Willebrord Snell, about 1621.

Speed of Thought.

Many people have noticed the remarkable quickness of thought in dreaming, how a long story, with many details and extending over a great period of time, will dash through the mind in a few minutes, but they seldom have any means of approximtely measuring the quickness with which they sometimes dream. There is now going the rounds of the press a story purporting to tell the dream of a railway engineer, which, if true, affords a means of measurement, and the story itself has every appearance of being a genuine relation of experience. The engineer had been without sleep and on duty for many hours, and at last fell asleep on his post. Then he dreamed quite an elaborate story of an accident resulting from confusion of train orders; how he studied over the words of the dispatch, trying to make out their meaning, and then how, his train coming into collision with another, he was thrown into the air and dropped back into his seat in the cab with his hand on the throttle. At that instant consciousness returned, and he found that it was all a dream and that although his train was travelling at the rate of forty-five miles an hour, it had only gone 250 feet while the dream was passing through his mind, this distance being fixed by the position of the train with respect to signal lights on the line. This is the interesting part of the story, for if these measurements are approximately correct, the dream occupied less than four seconds of time.

SCIENCE.

Steel tubes are found to retain twice as much magnetism as steel rods and are therefore better for permanent magnets.

It is held that some of the rays of electric light are hurtful to vegetation, but these may be held back by transparent glass.

Wire laths are now being used instead of wooden ones, and it is a very important step in the direction of making buildings really fireproof.

Experiments show that Portland cement expans. Three glass bottles filled with it and sealed burst in two, eight, and ten days respectively.

The time occupied in tanning sole or harness leather is from twenty to thirty days. The best English sole is said to take from four to six months.

Seventy-five per cent. of the paper made in Germany is manufactured of wood pulp. Even for the better qualities of paper wood pulp is used as a substitute for rags.

Fire-extinguishers are generally charged with carbonate of lime or carbonate of soda and water, with a combining quantity of sulphuric acid in a position to be discharged into the water at the required time.

Richard A. Proctor calls attention to the fact that the late Prof. Draper succeeded in producing photographic plates showing stars which cannot be seen through the telescope by which these photographs were taken.

Human skin and that of young rabbits have been successfully applied in small pieces to large healing surfaces in wounds. Dr. Wilson, however, in the Medical News, claims to have obtained much better results from the use of the internal membrane of hens' eggs.

The suggestion has been made that sanitary advantages would result from the use of sewer pipes of glass. They would, doubtless, be expensive, but they would, probably, be very durable, and their hard, smooth surface would offer no lodgment for refuse matter, thus off-setting the question of cost.

The vapor of tobacco juice has been tested with success as an insect destroyer in hot-houses. The tobacco is soaked or boiled and placed in an open dish over a fire or flame of a lamp in the conservatory. Delicate plants are not injured as by tobacco smoke; the atmosphere is inoffensive; thrips, scales and slugs are effectually disposed of. One quart of tobacco juice, evaporated in a house containing 350 cubic feet, suffices.

If it is true, as Dr. T. Stephenson asserts in Guy's Hospital Reports, that water does, under certain conditions, act energetically upon zinc and galvanized iron, a simple test for the presence of zinc will be useful. Dr. Stevenson adds to the clear water, slightly acidulated with hydrochloric acid, a little ferrocyanide of potassium (yellow prussiate), when, if zinc is present, a whitish cloud immediately forms.

Sheet-metal boats have recently been patented. Sheet-metal sides are bent under pressure to the required shape, having flanges on their lower edges for riveting to the keel-bar, and the stern ends may be joined either with or without stern-plates. The bent plates forming the boats sides may be packed in small space for transportation, and easily put together on reaching their destination, the design being to so construct boats lighter than of wood or of numerous plates of metal riveted together.

Christian Progress.

Not much more than one hundred years ago Voltaire declared that the twilight of Christianity had come. It is less than a century since Thomas Paine boasted in his "Age of Reason" that like a woodman in the forest, he had gone through the Bible, cutting down everything in his path. The priests, he said, might stick the trees in the ground again, but they could not make them grow. These predictions have been fulfilled in a way that would make their authors blush if they were now living. Native Protestantism in France, aided by Mr. Cook's evangelists, has burst the fetters which Romanism and infidelity had united in fastening upon it; while in England, and especially in our own country, the evangelical denominations have much more than kept pace with the growth of the population. The herstical sects, meanwhile, are stationary, or dying out. Neither Unitarianism nor Universalism has the strength that both possessed a quarter of a century ago.

The modern churches may not be without their faults. There is no earthly Eden across which the serpent has not trailed. Yet the religion of to-day, even when its defects are made the most of, will compare favourably with that of one hundred years ago, taken in the same way. Slave-trading, slave-holding, liquor making, selling and drinking ministers, and laymen are not now found in any church. Those guilty of the least of these offenses are very few and and very unpleasantly conspicuous. Pride, avarice, and other forms of worldliness, no doubt, exist, but they are compelled by public opinion, as well as ecclesiastical discipline, to manifest themselves in decorous ways. The most worldly man expects Christians to act consistently with their professions, and in thus doing unconsciously pays tribute to a creed which he may repudiate both in theory and practice. The churches are growing in grace, but there is abundant room for greater progress, for profounder convictions, and more thorough consecration.

Machine Guns.

Machine guns in the field are now entirely abandoned. The French mitrailleuse, from which such wonders were expected, was as heavy as a field gun and required six horses to draw it. Its range was practically the same as that of infantry, and had its disadvantages. If the range was correct and the mark remained steady, great execution was done, but the slightest error would throw every bullet out, unless at short range. Both French and Germans have given up machine guns for the field, and have increased and developed their field artillery. They both admit that the machine gun cannot face field artillery at artillery ranges, and that its projectiles have no power whatever against walls or buildings or earthworks; but they believe when two hostile bodies of infantry are closing, the machine guns may be brought from cover, in which they should be kept till then, and may then exercise great influence on the result.

The Venetian Gondolier and his Gondola.

The gondoliers soon become devotedly attached to their own boats, studying their characters and learning their peculiarities; for each gondola has a character and a temperament of its own in spite of the fact that they are all built on the same model and look so much alike, and a gondolier's skill in rowing largely depends on his knowledge of his boat. He and his gondola become one. A community of interests is established between them which soon ripens into affection; and his duty to his gondola is at least as binding on the conscience of a good gondolier as his duty to his family or his neighbor. He spends hours every day in sponging, scrubbing, and drying his boat, and comes to know every nail in its hull, and every scratch upon its steel or brass. I have heard of a gondolier who identified, swore to, and recovered a pair of sea-horses that had been stolen from him, on the strength of certain almost invisible scratches, which had escaped the notice of the thief, or which the thief trusted would be unknown to the owner. With so much uncovered metal in the fittings of a gondola, it is clear that the chief labor connected with the maintenance of the boat will be to keep these metals in a high state of polish. The brasswork does not give so much trouble; but the least drop of rain or dew, if it is allowed to settle for some hours upon the ferri, will produce a rust spot which may take months of scrubbing to remove. This implies a polishing and oiling of the steel-work twice a day in wet weather--a matter of at least an hour and a half. Indeed, the readiest way to determine whether a man who offers his services is a good gondolier or not is to give a glance at his ferri; that will show his professional character in a moment. But besides the metal fittings, the hull of the gondola requires constant attention to keep it free of weeds which foul its bottom, and to protect it from the deadly teredo which so rapidly bores through its planking.

Once every three months in winter, and at least once every twenty days in summer when the sea is warm and the weeds grow fast, the gondola must be sent to the squero. There it is hauled on shore, scraped, dried, either by the sun or by a fire of straw, and plentifully anointed with grease. This operation makes a most surprising difference to the speed of the boat; and a little practice will soon let one know whether the gondola has lately been to the squero, or ought to be sent there. The process of cleaning occupies a whole day; so that a gondolier not only loses a day's work, but has to pay besides about four lire, the cost of the operation; and this in summer is a serious tax upon his monthly earnings. But, on the whole, it repays a gondolier to attend punctually to his boat. If he does so it will last him in excellent order for at least five years. At the end of that time he can sell the hull for 80 or 100 lire, keeping, of course the felze, tenda, cushions, and other furnishings for his new boat. A gondola of five or six years old will probably find its way to one of the less frequented ferries, where it will do duty for another five years, gradually losing its graceful curve and form as the woodwork fails, till at length it becomes a gobbo, with its bows no longer sweeping up in a proud curve, but buried in the water. Then its day is over. It is fit for nothing but to be sold for five lire, broken up, and burned in the glass furnaces of Murano, the crematory of most ancient gondolas.

Skirmishers.

Skirmishers are troops who, not being intended for close combat, are employed to cover those who are so intended. They are independent of the attacking troops, whose front they cover, and may be at any number of spaces' interval without deranging the attacking troops in their rear, behind whom they may rally after they have played their part. The object of employing skirmishers has been to oblige the enemy to show its hand, and to cover the advance of the line of battle in their rear by attracting the attention and fire of the enemy. And the rapid fire of breech loaders has immenely increased the value of "skirmishers," both in attracting the attention of the defenders and in veiling by its smoke the march of the line of battle behind them. By our drill regulations "scouts" seem to be intended as a sort of substitute for "shirmishers," which on the scale of 10 or 12 to cover a battalion front, they cannot be. The German teaching--that men once engaged can never be withdrawn--does not apply to "skirmishers," but to the first fighting line of the attacking troops, respecting whom they say is true. During the Peninsula war neither the French nor ourselves ever ventured to engage without covering the front of the attacking troops with skirmishers, and the argument in favor of that practice is greatly strengthened by the conditions of breech-loading fire. It seems to follow, therefore, that troops destined to attack, whether formed in one closed line as of old, or in four open lines, should always be preceded by skirmishers in the old sense of the term. And this once established, we believe it would be found that the loss suffered by a closed line during its advance under fire would not be greater than that of a system, as now practised, of open lines backed by small columns of reserve. And the closed line would possess the immense advantage of preserving the different company and wing commands unmixed.--Blackwood Magazine.

Another Reading.

A recent Biblical scholar writes as follows:--Perhaps not one of the events recorded in Scripture has given rise to more fruitless controversy that the alleged act of Joshua commanding the sun and the moon "to stand still," in the memorable route of the five Kings, and that these bodies obeyed him. Did this miracle occur in the way the ordinary translation reads and as the most of the orthodox believe it did? An able writer in the Church Quarterly Review endeavors, with a high degree of probability, to maintain that what the Israelitish leader prayed for was not that the sun and moon might "stand still," but that they might "be silent"--that is to say, "cease to shine"--dom shemesh, as the Hebrew text has it. A storm of hail-stones was the principal cause of the defeat of the allied Kings. Joshua, finding that the storm and darkness by which it was accompanied did more towards the overthrow of the enemy than his own troops naturally prayed that the darkness might continue until the utter ruin of the foe was accomplished. The formidable astronomical objections to the miracle are thus at once removed by a simple philological discovery.

Day and Night in Egypt.

The air is simply perfect; bracing, yet not cold, except in the early morning. It is a delightful experience altogether and we all enjoy it thoroughly. I think I like the early mornings best; for I generally wake about half-past four, and, just drawing back the curtains of my window, enjoy the gorgeous vision of an Eastern night, quite different from any thing we ever see in our cold, northern clime. Great as is the contrast between an English and an Egypt winter, in the heat of the sun, and the cloudlessness of the sky during the day, I think the nights are even more remarkable. The atmosphere is so clear that each star of any magnitude seems almost like a moon, and casts its independent track upon the water; while, as to the moon herself, how can one describe the beauty of that pale golden sphere, that hangs suspended like a huge globe from the deep azure vault of heaven shedding so strong a light that it is easy to read by it! Towards six the stars begin to pale, and even the moon to lose some of her effulgence, before the bright light of the coming dawn, which, in its turn, has to give way to the rising sun, the earliest rays of which gild the mountain tops, and throw a roseate tint over the desert wastes of sand stretching into the far distance, and over the fields of dazzling green nearer at hand. Soon the old landscape is flooded with life and light; and another bright cloudless Egyptian day has begun. But if the sunrises are beautiful, what shall I say of the sunsets? About the one there is almost an air of chilliness--a hope and promise of what is to come, mingled with a feeling of responsibility and a sort of half dread of what the day may possibly bring forth. About the other there is a sense of fulfilment and repose, before night comes and throws her mantle over the world.--Lady Brassey.

The Horse Cars of Paris.

An amusing feature of Paris to a foreigner, is the horse cars. The appearance of the car, driver and conductor, would almost assure one that they had been imported from America; but certain rules to be observed in running the cars, very quickly remind him that he is in France. The cars are allowed to carry only a certain number of passengers--ten standing on the front platform, ten on the rear platform, and as many in the car as are allowed to have seats. Those inside pay fifty centimes, (ten cents,) and those outside twenty-five centimes. When the car has its complement, the gates are shut, a sign hung out, "complet" and no one can enter. During the busy time of the day, between five and six o'clock, when crowds are waiting for a car, it is necessary to apply at the office for a numbered ticket.

For instance, say you applied and received No. 21. You wait for a car, and the driver, when ready, begins to call une, deux, trois, and so on until he reaches your number, when you must be ready to enter, if not, you must procure another ticket, and wait your turn again.

The system has its advantages as well as its disadvantages, and the French think is a great thing; but the amusing part of it to foreigners is the calling of the numbers; and unless one is pretty well up in French, he is very apt to get left, and has to go and get another ticket.

Instead of ringing a bell like our conductor, they use a kind of horn, which is attached to the dashboard, and blown by a rubber ball which the driver presses. The sound, which is not unlike that of a cow-horn can be heard distinctly for a block. It is not objectionable unless the instrument happens to be out of order, and then it is very unmusical. The cars are a great convenience, and are very liberally patronized. One sees in them the economy of the French people as a class, very finely dressed ladies standing on the platform to save five cents. Economy is observable everywhere in France, and there is much truth in the aphorism that "the people could live on what the Americans waste."

The Standard.

MARKDALE JUNE. 19, 1884.

A Clean Sheet.

The Methodist Church of Markdale, have wound up the business of the past conference year, and report a clean sheet in every particular. The minister's salary is paid in full; this of course is nothing new, as they do it every year, but then there was a debt hanging over the church and parsonage for a number of years, both of which are now entirely wiped out The parsonage property comprizes half an acre on Mark Street, which is a most handsome location and a valuable property with a comfortable brick dwelling thereon, while the church premises which corners that of the parsonage also contains half an acre, fronting on Toronto Street, and is a very handsome and valuable property. There is a probability, should the harvest be a bountifull one, of a fine brick church being erected in 1885. Too much credit and thanks cannot be given the ladies of the congregation for their untiring and successful efforts in assisting to bring about this very desirable state of affairs.

Vandeleur.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—I have read with pleasure the "Parable" in last weeks STANDARD, now I do not persume to act as judge for the public, but as this is not the first time the Advance has taken upon itself to say what is, or is not fit for public reading, and as it has also refused the public the privilage of reading, that they may judge for themselves. I would just like to remark that I think it quite probable that the 'blasphemy' was some place in the vicinity of the Advance office when that parable met its besetting sin, and also, I think it sometimes beholds through a(smoked) glass darkly, as the last time I saw it, it was "sucking vehemently" at the other end of an immense pipe.

LIBERTY.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

W. H. Flesher, Esq., son of W. K. Flesher, Esq., ex M. P., who moved from here some month ago to reside in Parry Sound, has returned to this village and taken up his abode here. Mr. Flesher is an active useful citizen we welcome to our midst again,

A large number of people from the village and vicinity availed themselves of the pleasure of the cheap trip to Toronto last week being the excursion under the auspices of the Flesherton Methodist Sabbath School. The day was all that could be desired, and although many returned well tired the general expression was, we had a good time.

Mrs. Fred Gee of Flesherton station departed this life last Thursday evening, her remains which were entered in the Flesherton cemetary last Saturday was followed to the grave by a very large number of sorrowing friends, being one of the largest funerals we have seen in this part of the country.

A little boy, son of Mr. Jas. Ludlow, met with a sad accident a few days ago, by falling from a horse and breaking his arm above the wrist.

Mr. Barnhouse of this place lost a valuable cow a few days ago, being choked with a potatoe.

The Presbyterian church here will be opened on Sunday the 29th. by Rev. Mr. Smith of Toronto. A tea meeting will be held, and a lecture given by the above gentleman, on the evening of the 1st of July, Dominion Day in the town hall. Mr. Smith gave a lecture here on the occassion of the laying of the corner stone of this church, which was an intelectual treat and very highly appreciated, and there is no doubt there will be a large attandance at the opening and tea-meeting.

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

The captain of the Salvation Army was here last week, and made arrangements to attact the devil on the Dundalk fortress, some time this week.

Mr. Chas. McConnell is again in luck, having on Sunday last trapped a large bear, weighing 295 lbs., and measuring 28 inches around the upper part of the fore leg.

Very little stir here concerning the Scott Act. If the scheme was well worked up in this section, a large majority would be polled in its favor, but as yet no move has been made in the matter by anyone. Temperance people here are doubtless awaiting the action of the committee at headquarters. We understand that Flesherton is the central point of engagements for Proton, Osprey and Artemesia.

Mr. Kirvan, formerly of Markdale, died here on Saturday last. His remains were taken on the 11.20 train going north to be interred in the family burying ground.

A false alarm of fire on Monday night aroused the majority of our citizens from their sleep.

Dundalk and Shelburne cricketeers played a match here on Thursday last By careless fielding the Dundalk club lost the game by two runs.

Dundalk lacrosse club went to Shelburne on Tuesday last to play a match there. Of course our boys will be the victors.

Personals.

Capt. Winfield visited Markdale last week.

Mr. Wm. Smith visited friends in Mono last week.

Mrs. W. A. Brown is visiting friends in Toronto.

Miss Bell Brown of Woodstock is visiting her brother in Markdale.

Hattie and Leona Mathews are visiting friends in Parry Sound.

Mr. G. S. Brown of Meaford was in town last week. His health is much improved after his late sojourn in the South. He intends visiting ArKansas shortly again.

Miss Victoria Lyons, left on Tuesday to visit friends at St Mary's.

Mr. Wm. Scott of Innisfil, visited his sister Mrs. Donnelly in Glenelg this week.

N. McColman, Esq, M. P. P., gave us a call on Monday.

Mr. Jos. McArdle of Hopeville was in town this week.

Mrs. Rutledge Sen., has been visiting friends in Toronto the past, and this week.

Mrs. Thos. Hill departed on Wednesday for a six week leave, she will join her husband who went before, in London.

We are pleased to learn that Mr. Thos. Irwin is gaining and hopes are now entertained of his regaining his former health,

General Sessions and County Court.

(From the O. S. Times.)

THE General Sessions and County Court for this County commenced on Tuesday. His Honor Judge Macpherson, presiding. The following gentlemen composed the Grand Jury:—

John Stronach, Foreman; Quinton Campbell, Alfred Ward, Hugh Knott, Jas. Hastie, Wm. Hunter, John Ferguson, John Baines, James Calvert, Wm. McLarty, James McInnes, John Wheeler, James Lindsay, Thos. Julian, George Riddell, David Ammerman, Jno. Douglas, Andrew Welfley, Chas. Theckston.

The following business was disposed of:

MERRITT vs. ASHTON—Action on account. Verdict for plaintiff by consent, $184 97. D. A. Creasor for plaintiff, John Creasor, Q. C., for defendant.

WEDNESDAY.

The Grand Jury having brought in a true bill against Charles Coulson and Venwyck for assaulting a peace officer, they pleaded guilty to common assault, and were fined $50 and $10 respectively. A Frost for the Crown. Jas. Masson for defendant.

CHRISTOE vs. SINCLAIR et al—Action on an account. Judgement for plaintiff, $126·50. A. Frost for plaintiff. J. Masson for defendants.

Jno. M. Davis, accused of obtaining property by false pretences, was brought into Court and discharged, their being no evidence against him.

In the cases of Martha Brown for larceny of jewellery, and Wm. Driffil for assault, the Grand Jury found no bills.

R. H. Langdale of Normanby, and Dennis Sullivan of Owen Sound, were appointed constables.

GOOD THE YEAR ROUND.

At all seasons, when the system is foul and the digestion wowers feeble, or the liver and kidnes inactive, Burdock Blood Bitters are required.

PAIN from indigestion or sick head ache is instantly relieved by one dose of Rejuvinator Bitters, made from roots and herbs.

Send the STANDARD to your friend who lives at a distance. It will only cost you 50 cents for ballance of '84.

Mr. W. J. Watson, late of the Meaford Mirror was banquetted last week on the eve of his departure from that town.

MR. D. E. WRIGHT of Flesherton wishes to sell a village lot in Markdale, and a Park lot in Flesherton. See Adv. in this paper.

GLENELG Agricultural Society will hold their fall show in their grounds Markdale, on the 2nd and 3rd of October.

ARTEMESIA district Orange Lodge held a meeting on Saturday the 14th at Flesherton when it was decided to go to Shelburne the 12th July.

RESPECT OLD AGE.

An old favorite is the remedy known as Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry. Thirty years releable for cholera morbus diarrhœa and summer complaints.

The Owen Sound Advertiser last week gave the Mirror credit for a STANDARD clip. Accidents will happen.

Dr. Oldham, of Chatsworth evidently thinks "It is not good for man to live alone," and has taken unto himself a wife. He has our best wishes.

For the best 30 cent TEA go to R. J. Sproule's Flesherton.

Chatsworth is to have a pic-nic on Dominion Day at Kelley's Grove near the village, the proceeds in aid of the new town hall building fund. That's a sensible idea.

NO SUCH WORD AS FAIL.

A failure to relieve or cure summer complaints can never be truthfully applied to Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry. All dealers sell it.

WILLIAMSFORD will celebrate Dominion Day by horse races, games and sports, for which prizes will be awarded, and will wind up with a grand hop in the evening.

LARDINE MACHINE OIL, is the delight of farmers, and a pleasure to all men using Machinery, it cannot be excelled, it has recieved the highest awards at Dominion and Provincial Exhibitions. McCall Bros. & Co., sole manufacturers, Toronto.

If all the A. O. U. W. of Markdale would die the widows would draw $66,000.00. Some one remarked that it would be a great blessing; did he mean the decease of so many or the handsome legacies secured thereby.

GREAT NEGLIGENCE.

There is great neglect with most people to mantain a regular action of the bowels, which causes much disease. Burdock Blood Bitters cure constipation.

Mr. Alex. Erskine of the 9th con., Euphrasia, has purchased from Mr. G. S. Brown of Meaford, a fine thoroughbred short horn bull 3 years old, which will be for service on his lot 18 for this season. Terms $1.25 at time of service, or $1.50 if not so paid.

Mrs. Geo. Pilkie of Glenelg had her arm broken above the rist about three weeks ago while getting over the bars after milking. It appears the bar turned while getting over throwing her upon her hands, she is now doing well but has suffered much from the accident.

THE Markdale cattle fair in July is expected to be by far the largest yet held in Markdale, Messrs. James Bennett and Henry Savage, extensive drovers of Orangeville have promised to be on hand and other strangers are expected to be here together with the local buyers. Remember Saturday the 5th July.

UNKNOWN TO SCIENCE.

That preperation is undiscovered which can surpas Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry as a cure for Cholera Morbus, Dysentery and summer complaints.

IRISH LAKE PICK NIC.—The eighth annual pick nic will be held at the Irish Lake, Artemesia on Thursday the 26th June when the usual athletic games will be competed for and prizes awarded. Refreshments will be provided on the grounds, also good music, Gates open at nine o'clock a. m. Admission 25 cents, dinner 10 cents.

Mr. Thos. Mathews has purchased from Mr. G. S. Brown, the place recently occupied by Mr. Kirvan opposite the City Hotel, Mill St., and will fit the building thereon for a harness shop. This is an excellent stand.

NEW PEAS.—Mr. John Stedwill, of Artemesia, will accept thanks for a mess of green peas, this is doubtless the first of the season in the district, they were almost fully grown, and were handed in to us on Monday last the 16th.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—Alfred H. Dickey formerly of this village, met with an accident in Owen Sound last Thursday while working at the C. P. R. elevator which caused his death in a few hours afterwards. It appears a scantling fell some 40 feet striking Dickey on the back. He was married about two months since and leaves a young widow to mourn his untimely death.

LARDINE MACHINE OIL

Is Manufactured Soldly by McCall Bro's. & Co. Toronto, and is the only popular Machine Oil to-day in use by all mill men and farmers. Try Lardine.

On the night of wednesday of last week, 11th inst., some jealous minded person or persons entered the farm of Mr. Wm. Wright and carried off three whips, and two buggy dusters, after the marriage of Mr. Wright's daughter, the owners of the above property were stopping at his place, as it is well known who the miscreants are it behooves them to return the goods otherwise their names will be made public.

A WIDE AWAKE DRUGGIST.

Mr. A. Turner is always wide awake in his business, and spares no pains to secure the best of every article in his line. He has secured the agency for the celebrated Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption. The only certain cure known for Consumption, Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Hay Fever, Bronchitis, or any affection of the throat and lungs. Sold on positive guarantee. Will give you a trial bottle free. Regular size $1.00.

THE excursion from this village under the auspices of the Presbyterian S. School on Tuesday, was very well patronised, and if least added to the comfort or enjoyment of the trip they must have had a boss time. Some complained, after their return, that the hard side of the seats in the coaches were uppermost. It appears they were emmigrant cars, the seats being without cushions, quite a number remained over, while others got left.

DOWN IN DIXIE.

The wife of Mr. J. Kennedy, dealer in drugs in Dixie, was cured of a chronic cough by Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam. The best throat and lung dealer known.

MARKDALE will celebrate Dominion Day, by horse races, games and sports, Bicycle race, Tug of War &c., Great interest is expected in the tug of war between Glenelg and Holland against Artemesia and Euphrasia, six men from each township, the prize is $12, to the winning team. The Bicycle race will also be something new and interesting while the ladies pacing exhibition around the course will be most interesting and will doubtless stimulate a greater number to practicing that wholesome exercise, on the noble animal, the horse.

Euphrasia Council.

The council met as a Court of Revision on 30th May, 1884. Members all present. The following action took place in reference to the assessment for the current year;—

Robt. Orr confirmed, Robt. Clarke reduced $100, Ralph Onio confirmed, Thos. Gilray's assessment changed and corrected, James McClung raised $100, John Kerr confirmed, Thomas Brady confirmed, George Vickers reduced $800, Daniel Wilson, confirmed, J. McMorris reduced $100, W. Kerr confirmed, Ann Sparling reduced $500, Thos. Reid reduced $100, Jas. Perry reduced $100, Thos. Sparling reduced $50, J. Best reduced $100, Jas. McCallan raised $300, J. L. Wilson reduced $100, W. Ross Perry placed on the roll as farmer's son, Samuel Bath raised $200; the assessment of Saml. Kerr, R. Kerr and James Kerr, Esqs., corrected and confirmed; Jas. Curry Wm. Milson, Thos. Muxlow and Joseph Myers confirmed; Geo. Reid raised $100, David Clarke, W. Fawcett, W. E. Hewish, J. Elliott, Robt. Snell and J. Longheed confirmed, Mark Armstrong's assessment changed, Robert Erskine assessed for N½ 5, con. 9, Thomas Gilray's assessment corrected, the name Edward Birks, placed on the Roll as owner.

The Court adjourned until 10 o'clock a. m. on 18th June next. A special meeting of council was called by the Reeve, for dispatch of general business. The Reeve's orders were on the order of the Treasurer to pay as follows, viz.:

To A. T. Buchanan $75, salary as assessor, and 50 cents. postage on notices sent to Non Residents; Chas. Watt, Esq., $310 payment for 40 road scrapers; C. W. Rutledge $41.50, printing Minutes, Auditors report, and advertising; Robt. Dunlop, clerk $20 prepairing Minutes for press, and $6 to pay for serving notices, for court of Revision.

Council rose.

The Council met pursuant to adjournment on 6th June 1884. Members all present. Minutes of first session of the Court of Revision and special meeting of council read and confirmed. The Reeve was requested to arrange with the Reeve of Collingwood Township, in reference to improvement on town line at Mitchells hills.

Francis Eaton was employed to repair 18 & 19 side line East of 4th line under supervision of the Reeve.

Mr. Black and Mr. Boyd, were appointed 3 & 4 side line, between the 9th line and 11th with a view of improvement, Mr. Black was appointed to get two bridges built on 7th line South of 6 & 7 side road. The petition of John Ormsby and others laid over for further consideration. The petition of James Front, Esq., and others laid over until next meeting of Council. The petition of Thos. Milne and others asking to get culvert built accepted, and the Reeve appointed to attend to this matter.

In compliance with petition of G. Blackwood and others, Mr. Boyd is appointed to make improvement on 9th line. The Treasurer was ordered to remit as follows, viz: Messrs. Rowsell & Hutchinson, $2.14, James Paterson, printer, Meaford, $8.62.

The Reeve's orders were issued on the Treasurer to pay as follows, viz: Thos. Jordan, $5 work on Epping rock; John Ross, $19, building bridge on 4th line.

Council adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m. on 18th June, when there will be a session of Council after a session of the Court of Revision.

ROBT. DUNLOP, Clerk.

INVALUABLE TO EVERY LADY!

"MAY DEW"

The Great French Lotion for Beautifying the Face.

It conceals the evidence of age. One application will make the most stubbornly red and rough hands beautifully soft and white. Remember that "MAY DEW" is not a paint or powder that fills up the pores of the skin, and that is injurious to the skin, but a new and great discovery, a vegetable liquid, that causes the cheek to glow with health, the neck, arms and hands to rival the Lily in whiteness. Impossible to detect in the beauty it confers any artificial character. It cures greasy Skin, Freckles, Wrinkles, Pimples, Black Heads, Crow's Feet, Blotches, Face Grubs, Sun Burn, Tan, Ringworm, Chapped Hands, Sore or Chapped Lips, Barber's Itch, Tetter, etc. It frees the pores, oil glands, and tubes from the injurious effects of powders and cosmetic washes. By its use all redness and roughness are prevented; it beautifies the skin, and will make it soft, smooth and white; imparting a delicious softness; imparting a perfectly healthy, natural and youthful appearance. The best face lotion that the world ever produced. We will send "A LARGE BOTTLE" to any address on receipt of price, $1. When ordering mention this paper.

Address all letters to the MAY DEW AGENCY, 167 Church Street, Toronto, Ont. Parlor and Reception Room for Ladies.

MARKDALE Steam Woollen Mill.

The undersigned would respectfully return thanks to their many customers and friends for the very liberal support accorded to them during the past, and would solicit a continuance of the same, as we are now ready to attend to all work intrusted to our care in CUSTOM CARDING, FULLING and WEAVING in first-class style. As we have put on new cards, and made other improvements, we will endeavor to do as good work in the future, if not better, than we have ever done in the past.

Customers wishing to have their wool carded, spun and made into blankets or flannel, on cotton warp, can have their orders attended to by leaving their wool as early as possible.

Please remember the place, Mill Street, west of the Railway Station.

AGRICULTURAL.

Seed Farming and Gardening.

According to science and the dictionaries, all grains are seeds, but practical experience frequently shows that the condition in which the former often reach the market renders them unfit for the purposes of seeding. In bad years much of the commercial grain is so injured by heating that its vitality is impaired, if not entirely destroyed. At the best grains in storehouses are so filled with seeds of weeds as to be unfit for seed purposes. Every year we find good farmers looking for clean seed, willing to pay an extra price for their requirements, which in itself would give a fair profit to the grower. In fact, however cheaply grain or other crops may sell, the farmer has only himself to blame if he fails to receive due remuneration for his labor. If he takes pains to produce the choicest crop he can usually sell at his own price, within reason, among his own neighbors for seed.

Why then do not more farmers devote their time and land to seed growing? There is, we are glad to say, increased attention to this branch of the business of farming, and with a corresponding reduction in the extraordinary profits that once were common. It shows that good farming, such as seed growing demands, is more generally prevalent now than formerly. But this good farming is itself based on securing pure seeds, and therefore the demand increases as does the supply. In fact, we believe that the tendency of the times is to crowd out all farmers who do not use pure seed and grow clean crops. Even for commercial purposes the poor grain is so inferior that there is no profit in it. The law which proclaims the survival of the fittest prevails in farming as it does in all other kinds of business.

With regard to many varieties of garden seeds it is probable that they should be more largely grown by farmers themselves than is the case at present. Such a course is accompained by some trouble and exertion, but the extra labor required involves an education which helps fit the man for something better. To grow a crop merely because it requires little care or skill is not only to condemn one's self to a life of poorly paid labor, but to correspondingly impair the character and mental grasp of the individual. The farmer who pursues a widely diversified industry needs, and has more intelligence than one who confines himself to a few easily grown staples. When farmers begin by market gardening on a small scale and the growing of choice, pure seeds, their style of farming improves in other respects. They are obliged to keep their land free from objectionable weeds, and quite often they discover that this necessity, instead of being a hardship, is a positive advantage.

Very few farmers have facilities for selling seed on a large scale at retail prices. If they grow such for market they must do so under contract, and the prices paid are but little in excess of ordinary market rates. Near cities and villages market gardening offers better inducements in the way of profit. It is a curious fact that many inland towns are supplied with vegetables grown by market gardeners on the high-priced lands near New York and Boston, and thence shipped to places that have not enterprise enough to supply the home demand. Wherever this is the fact there is a field which no time should be lost in filling. Even where no present demand appears to exist the production of fresh vegetables at reasonable rates is sure to create one. The market once secured will easily be retained. The route of a dealer in garden vegetables through a city is very like a milk route. Where the goods are satisfactory, and prices reasonable, customers are retained for years. It is a very sugestive fact that the farmer who once enters upon these branches of farming generally keeps at it as long as he lives; or if he sells out, then the chance of continuing the business and securing his old customers is an important consideration, often largely increasing the market value of his land. In one instance, where a new railroad was being run through a town, land taken from seed and garden farms was appraised more than twice as high as land beside it, naturally just as good, devoted to ordinary farm crops. The appraisers acted on the old rule, which generally fixes the value of property, that anything is worth in money that sum upon which its owner is able to make it continuously pay the interest. In this view not only does good farming pay, but it is also essential that those crops be grown which with care and skill may be expected to yield the largest returns from the soil. In this way the farmer who makes his farm bring the most revenue is at the same time increasing its value should he feel inclined to sell.—Am. Cultivator.

Luminous Plants.

There is a sort of fungus called Rhizomorpha subterranea, which stretches its root like tendrils along the walls and floors of mines, or other underground places. These tendrils exhibit lines of light which cause a considerable amount of illumination. Whether the luminosity is dependent on the presence of oxygen is a disputed point that does appear to have been determined. If so, it would look like the result of combustion, but combustion ever so slow seems inconceivable in so inert a form of plant life. Combustion, of course, goes on in the blood of animals; but even this, comparatively rapid as is, is far below the rate of combustion necessary to produce light, and it is incredible this can be the explanation; for by such combustion the tissue must speedily be consumed unless there were a process of repair and renewal entirely unparalleled in the very highest organization.

Another form of vegetable light has suggested some form of electric action. A daughter of Linnæus, sitting in the garden as the dusk grew on, noticed a spark or flash amongst some yellow nasturtiums. Her eyes were naturally fixed on the spot, and presently another slight flash raised her wonder to amazement. On going to the flower-bed she found that the flashes evidently proceeded from the nasturtiums. Of course, her father's attention was called to the phenomena, and he was convinced of its reality without, however, being able to conceive any explanation. The same thing has also been observed in marigolds by another botanist, and in the poppy by a third. As these flowers are so familiar it naturally occurs to ask why it should be reserved to scientific experts to see such things? But it should be remembered that the luminosity is very slight, momentary, and occasional. It is precisely the sort of phenomenon that eludes all but those who are continually on the watch. The observations, however, appear to be so well guaranteed that there is no sufficient reason for doubting them. In all these cases the light is only a momentary flash, and is therefore a very different thing from the steady gleam of insects or funguses. The fact that these flashes have been noticed when the flowers were just in full bloom would seem to suggest that the phenomenon may be connected with fecundation. The falling of the pollen on the anthers has been supposed to cause a momentary quickening of life, manifested in a faint flash. But that explains nothing. Of what nature is that flash? The only conjecture is that it is electric, but it is a conjecture only, and there is nothing more at present to be said.—Sunday Magazine.

Provide some old mortar in the hen-yard.

Under-draining causes the soil to be cooler in the summer.

Tarred paper wrappings injured and killed young trees in a Western orchard.

When only a few fowl are kept it is best to renew the stock every year.

The best way to use special manures is to sow them on the surface after partially filling the soil, then cultivate and harrow in.

Cut common brown wrapping paper into pieces four inches square and wrap around plants when planting. It will defend them from cut-worms.

Much of the failure with pear trees, in localities supposed to be unfavorable to the growth and bearing of pear trees, is undoubtedly owing to deficient care and culture.

Do not, in feeding calves, change too suddenly from one food to another; and give no more than is really eaten. Calves, like all other young animals, need frequent, rather than large feeds.

A variety of vegetables is used for filling silos in other countries. In France beet tops and the leaves of grapes are employed, in England turnip leaves and vetches, and in India different kinds of wild plants.

Dried blood on strawberry land, applied between the rows, 400 pounds per acre, increased a Kansas crop one-third, prolonged the period of ripening, and the fruit held its size. Results much better than with common manure.

Ensilage, properly made, says Dr. Hoskins, is a good feed, when properly used, as any that was ever devised for feeding dairy cows—as good as roots, and far less costly and difficult to produce in large quantities upon our American farms.

Salt is being freely used by nurserymen in their pear nurseries for the purpose of counteracting blight. Iron filings and copperas in solution have been used for the purpose. If these remedies do not prevent the disease, they at least correct a disposition to blight.

Success in raising house-plants may be forwarded by using soil, two-thirds of which is garden-soil and the rest sand. It should be kept light and loose about the roots, and the plants watered only as they appear to need it. When any of the leaves wither and fall, instead of throwing them away make little rolls of them and tuck them down in the earth, where they decay. This is the best fertilizer.

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

Ergotine is the most expensive drug now in the market, and costs nearly $1500 per pound.

Rain falling upon a dry soil and moistening it to some depth warms both the soil and the water.

The value of the unconsumed coal which makes the London fog and smoke is placed at $25,000,000 annually.

Mr. Dummer of Kittery, Maine, has invented a process by which copper can be welded as easily as iron as well as iron.

A bag of charcoal suspended in a cistern will purify the water, and meat wrapped in a cloth and packed in charcoal will keep fresh for weeks.

Java produces a vegetable wool which, freed from its leathery covering and the seeds, is worth sixteen and seventeen cents per pound.

Potassium bichromate is commended by Dr. Lanjirrois as a disinfectant for cesspools, sewage, etc., and he thinks it likeley to be of great use in diseases due to microbia.

Dr. Bell maintains that in the fat of cheese and fat milk the ratio of soluble to insoluble fatty acids is the same. He is speaking of real milk, and not a mixture of chalk and water.

It is discovered that prussic acid is an antidote to strychnine, but it will have to be administered with great care, for the required dose would itself be fatal but for the presence of the strychnine.

Bread is made on the Devonshire coast of England from a sea grass Porphyra laciniata, which is chopped and mixed with a little oatmeal. It will keep from four to eight days, and the people who use it are fond of it.

Contrary to the opinions of some eminent chemists, Dr. H. Strave holds that in the quality of the albumenoids in cows' milk and human milk there is no difference, but the latter has a smaller proportion of nitrogeneous matter, especially of caseine.

A towel folded several times and dipped in hot water and quickly wrung, and applied over the seat of the pain in toothache or neuralgia, will generally afford prompt relief. Headaches almost always yield to the simultaneous application of hot water to the feet and back of the neck.

Don't Hurry.

The bustling, hurrying man, as a matter of fact, is a poor worker. Too much of his steam power is expended in kicking up dust. The habit of hurrying and of feeling in a hurry is fatal to good work, and diminishes the amount of work a good man can accomplish. The man who accomplish most never seem in a hurry, no matter how much they have to do. They are not troubled for lack of time, for they make the most of the minutes by working in a cool, methodical manner, finishing each job properly, and not expending their nervous force in bustle. System will accomplish more than misdirected energy.

ITEMS OF INTEREST.

Referring to the coming visit of the King of Holland, who was born in Brussels, in 1817, a Belgian paper says: "The church where he was baptised is now a post-office; the ducal palace, which the States General built for his grandfather, has become the site for academies; the Castle of Tervueren, also presented, with its splendid park, to his father, is in ruins, burned to the ground, like the old Hotel d'Orange, where he was born."

It seems that the leaders of the ins and outs in England are pretty much of a muchness in respect to slaveholding antecedents. If Mr. Gladstone's father once owned, as it is asserted, 880 slaves, Lord Salisbury's grandfather and great-uncle were strenuous upholders of the "African trade," which, indeed, found no more vigorous defender than Gen. Gascoyne, M. P. for Liverpool, whose property near that city the Marquis inherits.

Impregnation of the atmosphere of a sick chamber when the patient is ill of diphtheria, measles, scarlet fever, or of any allied disease, with the odor of a mixture of equal parts of turpentine and carbolic acid is recommended by Dr. Vilandt. Half a teaspoonful of the mixture will be enough at a time, if it is put into a kettle of water kept near the boiling point. The odor generally gives some relief to the sufferer, and tends to prevent the spread of the malady.

M. Gibier recently offered to the French Academy of Sciences an account of his experiments with rabies. He found that he could easily inoculate guinea pigs, rats, etc., with hydrophia, and all his cases died with that disease. But the savant, according to the report, wound up his remarks by first proving that it was impossible for fowls to take hydrophobia, and then showing conclusively that they are the only animals who have ever been known to recover from this disease.

The Mahdi's famous lieutenant, Osman Digma, is described by one of his soldiers to be of tall and slender build, with pale complexion, large open eyes, and a fine moustache. His countenance expresses courage and energy; he is almost always on horseback, and wears over his left shoulder a veil, such as the Mohammedans of old wore. He generally carries a very long musket, and under his mantle a long sword. It is reported that he is very pious, without being a fanatic. He has only one wife and three children.

Copying paper, always damp and ready for use, is thus prepared:—One pound of chloride of magnesium is dissolved in a moderate quantity of hot or cold water. The solution is applied with a brush to copying paper, in book or other form, or, better, by means of cloth pads saturated with the solution. The pads are placed between any suitable number of leaves and pressure is applied, very moderate at first, in order that the paper may absorb enough of the liquid, and then the pressure is increased. The pads having been removed the paper is pressed and is then ready for use. The sheets will not stick together when thus treated.

On May 9 a commercial traveller found $4,600 as he was getting out of the train at Brussels, which belonged to a German dealer in horses, who had been travelling in the same compartment, and of whom he forthwith went in search, and met frantically rushing to the station. The worthy German, with prodigal generosity, offered him a dollar, which the finder declined. "Then," said the other, "you must at any rate come and dine with me; I cannot pass over such a service in this light manner." The invitation was accepted. The inviting guest appeared on time, but no host was forthcoming, and the guest, as he paid his bill, vowed to abstain for all time forth from favors toward Teutonic dealers in horseflesh.

At a meeting of the Iron and Steel Institute, London, the general introduction of metal sleepers for railroads was advocated by Mr. W. R. Browne. The experience of Germany had shown that the loss by corrosion was trifling on much-used roads, and that there was no complaints of "hard-running." Webb's wrought-iron sleepers proved a success in South Wales. A member stated that within the last two years 40,000 tons of iron permanent way had been sent abroad by British manufacturers, and that he himself had on hand 111,000 metal sleepers for exportation. Another member spoke in favor of superseding sleepers of every kind by the adoption of a steel rail of 140 pounds to the yard, as he believed that a rail of this kind was to be the rail of the future. The price of wooden sleepers is even now very close upon that of iron ones, and under very favorable circumstances the life of the farmer rarely exceeds twenty-one years.

Scarcely 25 years ago the most powerful piece of artillery was a 68 pounder, throwing its projectile with a velocity of 1,600 feet per second. Now the weights of guns have been increased from 5 tons to 100 tons, the velocities from 1,600 feet to 20,000 feet per second, the energies from 1,000 foot-tons to over 52,000, and the projectiles from 68 pounds to 2,000 pounds. But enormous as these attainments are expressed in figures the highest or greatest are as nothing when compared, as some one has remarked, with those of the projectiles, velocities, and energies existing in nature. Basing the estimates on the principles laid down by Helmholtz, if the earth, for example, be considered as a huge projectile, and if it could be possible to utilize the whole of the energy stored up in gunpowder, there would be required a charge 150 times greater than its own weight, and 900 times greater than its volume to impart her orbital motion to the earth.

The Moniteur Oriental of Constantinople quotes from an Arabic paper, El Zaman, some interesting items of information concerning that curious personage the Mahdi, from which we extract a few items,—"The Mahdi is very tall and thin, his complexion is ruddy brown, his eyes large, his nose thick; he has also thick lips, and very large fingers. He has eighteen wives; his followers and servants are fully convinced that their master is the mightiest sovereign in the world. He never undresses, even when he goes to bed. His clothes consist of a broad red garment, over which he wears a green mantle bordered with red. His head is crowned with a turban, over which a white veil is thrown. In his hand he always carries a rosary of a thousand ivory beads. On rising he appears very serious, and, instead of coffee, drinks a great glass of date wine. He then goes to the market, sits in front of a booth, and there dispenses justice. All complaints and petitions are brought to him, and, having inquired into them, he intrusts his vekyl with the execution of his decision. He then returns home, where his attendants receive him in state, and burn incense before him. After he has prayed, his dinner is served, at which more than two thousand people take part. Among the guests appear many Europeans wearing the turban."

Petrified Logs.

The United States mag boat, Tocoi, returned to the Savannah River a few days ago, where she is having some of her machinery overhauled. She was, until a couple of weeks ago, employed in clearing out the Altamaha River, from its mouth to the Ocomee River. The Tocoi is of comparatively light draft, but one of the most powerful boats of her class in the government service. She was furnished with a good supply of dynamite cartridges, and an electric battery, which were found efficacious for the work she undertook. A large number of rocks, many projecting pieces of raft timber, besides several large trees, were removed from the channel, so that the river is quite clear for timber rafts and light draft steamers.

Among the obstacles to navigation which the Tocoi encountered, were a number of petrified trunks of trees, heavier than the largest stones that were taken from the bottom of the river. About thirty miles up the river from the Savannah, Florida and Western railway bridge, a large gum tree formed an obstruction—over twenty years ago. This huge trunk has broken up several very valuable rafts of timber that were being floated to Darien, and has directly and indirectly, caused a great deal of annoyance to all persons who were interested in the business on the river. There is a bend where the obstruction lay, and the locality came to be familiarly known among the people as the "Scooping Gum Bend." Here the raftmen were always in dread expectation of having the timber in their charge "scooped in," or broken up by contact with the obstruction referred to, and carried rapidly out of their control by the current, which flows very swiftly at this point.

When the Tocoi undertook to lift this sunken tree from the river bed, it was discovered that a monster of no insignificant proportions and weight, had to be dealt with. The powerful engines and tackle of the boat were found unequal to the task, and hence the obstruction had to be broken up with dynamite, and the pieces taken up separately. The entire trunk had been completely petrified, and was as heavy as iron. One of the pieces was estimated to weigh about seventy tons. Some of the fragments were exceedingly beautiful, being of different colors — some black, others crimson and violet, and others contrasting shades.

About Some Curious Locks and Keys.

In the middle ages locks for churches and cathedral doors were often rare specimens of art metal work. Elaborate scrolls, the images of saints, and other ambitious efforts of the true artisan of those days, entered into the design of locks which were really an ornament to the magnificent doors and cabinets of those times. A design for the escutcheon surrounding the keyhole frequently had the figures of two guardian angels with outspread wings. Locks of very curious construction, known as "Apostle locks," were also common in mediæval times. These locks had on the front the figure of one of the Apostles, and on touching the hand of the figure the bolt flew back. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth one Mark Scalist, a smith, constructed a lock consisting of eleven pieces of iron, steel, and brass, all of which, with a pipe key, weighed only two grains of gold. The great inventor, the Marquis of Worcester, who flourished in the reign of King Charles I., devised a lock containing a steel barb, which was perfectly harmless so long as the right key was used, but if a wrong key was inserted the barb sprang through the keyhole, and "caught the hand of the intruder as a trap catches a fox." It is said that while the inventor was experimenting with this curious lock he was scarcely nimble enough in removing his hand, and was caught in his own trap. At Willenhall, in Staffordshire, which is the great seat of the lock trade, silver padlocks the sides of which are much smaller than a threepenny piece, are still made, and are quite perfect in their mechanicism. Locks containing single bells, and even chimes, which sound an alarm when tampered with by a false key, are among the modern curiosities of the trade. Common padlocks are largely made for the natives of India and Africa at Walsall. A lock and key complete are sold by the maker for a half-penny, and merchants abroad state that many of the natives string these locks together so as to form necklets, and wear them as "charms."

The Monk's Lesson.

There was once an old monk walking through a forest with a scholar by his side. The old man suddenly stopped and pointed to four plants that were close at hand. The first was just beginning to peep above the ground, the second had rooted itself pretty well into the earth, and the third was a small shrub, while the fourth and last was a full-sized tree. Then the monk said to his young companion: "Pull up the first." The boy easily pulled it up with his fingers. "Now pull up the second." The youth obeyed, but not so easily. "And the third." The boy had to put forth all his strength and use both arms before he succeeded in uprooting it. "And now," said the master, "try your hand on the fourth." But lo! the trunk of the tall tree, grasped in the arms of the youth, scarcely shook its leaves, and the little fellow found it impossible to tear its roots from the earth. Then the wise old monk explained to the scholar the meaning of the four trials. "This, my son, is just what happens with our passions. When they are very young and weak one may, by a little watchfulness over self and the help of a little self-denial, easily tear them up; but if we let them cast their roots deep down into our souls, then no human power can uproot them—the Almighty hand of the Creator alone can pluck them out. For this reason, my child, watch well your first impulses."

The esteem of wise and good men is the greatest of all temporal encouragements to virtue, and it is a mark of an abandoned spirit to have no regard to it.

"My dear fellow," said a critic, after examining a painting by his artist friend, "do you not see that you have pinned that angel's robe together with a gold brooch? Who ever saw an angel with a brooch?" Artist, after a moment's reflection: "True, but who ever saw an angel without a brooch?" Critic silenced, but feeling that he had not stated his case properly.

"..., why didn't yer let Bill Thomson take yer home from the ball las' night?" "..., Moll; he done gone an' showed hisself a coward, that's why." "And how did he do dat, Liza?" "Why he had two razors in his pockets, an' I says dat enny fellow dat carries more'n one razor to a ball wid him is a coward and ain't no gen'leman." "..." "Guess you're about right."

Guest—"I did not know you had a band here." Landlord—"Oh, yes, I have one this season." Guest—"How often do they play?" Landlord—"Only once a day—in the afternoon or evening." Guest—"Wouldn't it be better to have them play in the morning?" Landlord—"Why in the morning?" Guest—"Because then the guests, rested, refreshed and invigorated by a good night's sleep, are better able to stand it."

"Mary, I want a messenger to send down town," said a lady to her maid; "the salesman has sent me the wrong bundle and I want to inform the forelady of her carelessness. Is there any one disengaged?" THE MASSACRE OF CAWNPORE.

A Visit to the Scene of "The Blackest Crime in Human History."

Cawnpore is a thriving manufacturing city of some 125,000 inhabitants. In commercial importance it is only second to Calcutta and Bombay. It furnishes the railways centering here with more traffic than any two or three interior towns put together. Its greatest notoriety, however, is associated with its past. Here was perpetrated what many have called "the blackest crime in human history," the horrible Cawnpore massacre.

I shall only review the incidents of this massacre, which are necessary in connection with my visitation of the scenes which it involved.

Early one morning after Chota Hazree, I rode over to the Memorial Church in company with a citizen. The Memorial Church, as the name implies, is an edifice of the State religion, erected near the scene of the memorable resistance of Gen. Wheeler. The church is a splendid European-built structure, with marble memorial tables, exquisite tile floors, and all the appointments of a high-toned house of worship. Indeed, the building is so modern and elegant, without regard to the climate, that in the summer it is found impossible to use it. Summer services, by the way, commence at 6 o'clock in the morning in this part of the country universally.

Just without the church was the intrenchment of 1857, a miserable mud wall about four feet high, every vestige of which has now disappeared. Here 1,000 persons defended themselves for twenty-two days against the hottest kind of a fire from

THOUSANDS OF BLOOD-THIRSTY PAGAN FOES.

Of the number 560 were women and children, and only 440 men. The sufferings of these women and children are almost beyond belief. They had no shelter except such as their distraught male protectors could improvise for them. The thermometer went up to 140 degrees in the shade, and the sun's rays penetrated every part of the intrenchment. Many perished from sunstroke or disease. Their food was scarcely sufficient to keep them alive. When they wanted water they had to risk their lives by venturing out to a well, which is still to be seen here, in plain view of the enemy. Shot and shell wrought sad mischief until the 27th of June, when the men ordered a semi-surrender, chiefly out of consideration for the dying women and children. The Nana Sahib, leader of the Sepoy mutineers, had promised to honorably conduct the party to the Ganges, embark them, and send them down the river in perfect safety.

Accordingly the people who were not sick emerged from the entrenchment and confided themselves to the protection of the treacherous Nana. It was understood the sick should be returned for.

The eager prisoners marched down to the river, and embarked from the Gate Chowra Ghat. No sooner had they been loaded upon the boats than hundreds of unseen natives opened fire upon them. Their boats were stranded, and although they did their best to return the fire and get off, they could but become easy victims to this, the basest instance of treachery on record in military history. Only three men in all that company of 1,000 escaped death, and but 206 women and children were left. Among the massacred were a few Americans.

These 206 women and children were then dragged to a building which has gone down into history as the House of Massacre. They were crowded into two small rooms, twenty by ten feet in dimensions, and kept there until July 15, when, by the order of this same Nana, they were every one slaughtered. Nana had heard of Gen. Havelock's advance, and while he boasted of the strength to vanquish him in battle, he gave orders that should be carried into execution, lest by any chance a rescue should be effected. But even the cruel Sepoys rebelled at the thought of such a crime, and Nana had to hire five butchers of the city to enter the house and professionally carry out his will. This they did, the five men consuming an hour and a half in taking the 206 lives. They were paid one rupee per victim, or in American money, about $85 jointly, for the bloody deed.

Then by order of Nana the mangled bodies were dragged to a well in the immediate vicinity, and cast down, the dying with the dead, into its crimson waters fifty feet below!

It is a matter of regret to every sympathetic traveller to know that this inhuman monster Nana soon after disappeared, and has never since been heard from; so that he probably escaped the punishment he merited.

When Gen. Havelock, the pious soldier, at length arrived at Cawnpore, and repaired to this Assembly-room, he found himself just thirty-six hours too late. The floor was still nearly ankle-deep with coagulating blood, while shreds of flesh and tufts of hair told of the barbarous violence that had been administered. The cuts on the walls that had been made with the butchers' knives were low down, showing how the poor victims had crouched before their assailants. In the meantime the sick who had been left behind at the entrenchment had also been slaughtered. There were many other massacres in the country round about that were as shocking, but none that were so wholesale. I have talked with men here who saw, as mere boys, the forms of European women cut open, a bottle of gunpowder inserted while they were still alive, and then the whole body blown to atoms.

How different is the Cawnpore of to-day from those scenes that were so bloody in 1857! It is now the fairest spots in India. Loving hands and an appreciative government have caused lovely flowers to spring up out of the ground that was so drenched with innocent blood, and marble memorials tell the sad story.—Correspondence New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Illinois has 255,741 farms, Ohio, 247,178, and New York, 241,058.

The new City Hall in Philadelphia has already cost $8,241,000, and is not yet finished.

Minnesota has no less than 7,000 lakes, which take up over 2,300,000 acres of territory.

The meat consumption of London is about 6,500 tons a week. This includes beef, mutton, and pork.

In each of the last two years there were more than 26 000 unaddressed letters detained at the General Post Office in England. In this batch was enclosed in cash year about £6,000 in cash, cheques, or some other form.

An organ with 174 registers has been built for the Cathedral of Riga. It is worked by an Otto gas motor of 4-horse power. Its largest wooden pipe is ten metres long with a cubical capacity of 2,000 litres. It is said to be the largest organ in the world.

The number of cigars consumed in Germany during the past year amounted to six millions of the aggregate value of 250,000,000 marks and a total weight of 36,565 tons; while the quantity of tobacco consumed in addition reached a value of 42,500,000 marks and weight of 36,595 tons.

Japan has at present 155 miles of railroad—from Yokohama to Tokio, 18 miles; Kobe to Otsu, 58 miles; Tsongaria, in the Province of Oomi, to Sekigahara, in the Province of Mino, 41 miles, and Tokio to Koumagai, 38 miles. There is besides in course of construction a road to unite Maybe-bashi to Tokio a distance of 84 miles.

During the past year the average quantity of water supplied in London amounted to 145,000,000 gallons per day. Of that enormous volume as much as 72,000,000 gallons, or nearly one-half, was taken from the Thames, while of the remainder nearly the whole was derived from the river Lea, and but a comparatively small fraction from deep wells sunk into the chalk.

Education has made rapid progress in Spain within the last quarter of a century. Since the passing of the law of 1857, which, among other things, provided for compulsory education in the case of all children between the ages of six and nine, the number of schools and scholars has more than doubled. Of the one there were in 1850, 13,334, and in 1878, 29,038, while in the same period the scholars increased from 652,163 to 1,633,288.

Grains of the different kinds produce alcohol in about the following proportions. Corn affords 40 pounds of spirits of the specific gravity of 0 9427, containing 45 per cent. of absolute alcohol for each 100 pounds of grain; wheat, 40 to 45 pounds of spirits; barley, 40; oats, 36; rye, 36 to 42; buckwheat, 40. Now 40 pounds of such spirits equal 2½ (3-5) gallons of Government proof spirits. Taking corn at 56 pounds per bushel, rye at 56 pounds, wheat at 60, barley at 48, oats at 32, and buckwheat at 52, these grains should afford the following quantities of proof spirits per bushel—Corn and rye, each 1 96 gallon, or about 2 gallons; wheat 2-1 gallons; barley 1·68 gallon; oats 1·12 gallon; buckwheat 1·82.

How vast are the periods of life alloted to the longeval trees may be judged, says Mr. L. H. Grindon, from the following list of ages known to have been reached by patriarchs of the respective kinds—Elm, three hundred years; ivy, three hundred and thirty-five years; maple, five hundred and sixteen years; larch, five hundred and seventy-six years; orange, six hundred and thirty years; cypress, eight hundred years; olive, eight hundred years; walnut, nine hundred years; oriental plane, one thousand years; lime, one thousand one hundred years; spruce, one thousand two hundred years; oak, one thousand five hundred years; cedar, two thousand years; yew, three thousand two hundred years.

The Lessons of Wealth.

People of wealth and rank can commend good habits by showing that they volantarily choose them. The great mass of thoughtless and ill-taught people are sure to covet what they see is sought for by those who have means and leisure at their own control. A wise and exact economy is at least as desirable in the management of a revenue of thousands of pounds as in the outlay of a weekly wage of a few shillings. Thrift and economy are not merely special virtues for the poor—an erroneous idea of them which springs from the false conception that they mean little beyond the not spending money. Nothing is further from the truth. Economy does not mean keeping money, but exchanging it for its utmost value. The best things of life are human love, physical health, mental enlightenment and freedom of action and in so far as money is laid out to secure these blessings for ourselves and for others, it is not spent, but invested at the most usurious of interests. Now, it happens as a matter of course that rich people are often those who have the faculty for making, keeping and saving money—a faculty, like all others, likely to be hereditary. A sensible woman once said: "I go to my rich friends to learn how to spend." Nor is this contradicted by the fact that misers have often spendthrift sons. A spendthrift is only a miser in the bud—the root of miserhood and spendthriftdom being identical—to wit, the seeking of our own selfish pleasure instead of our duty and the good of others.

Remedy for Sleeplessness.

Various soporifics, the sundry dietetic and regimenal expedients have been tried, with variable success; but the most successful remedy for persistent sleeplessness, I found to be a mental one, at the mention of which, I doubt not, many will exclaim—I mean, reading in bed. Dispensing with bed curtains—with due precautions to make the candle safe (self-extinguishing, if need be), it should be placed on a pedestal behind the head of the reader, as he lies on his right side, with back to the light, which falls on the book or pamphlet before him; which should be amusing or interesting but not exciting. My common experience was that ... the mind, gently and pleasantly occupied by subjects which drive away worrying and wakeful ... becomes ... in half an hour ... I began to feel sleepy—put out the candle, and fall asleep! But I cannot recommend the plan without again emphatically enjoining the proper precautions and limitations in its use.

THE STORY-TELLER.

A Few Minutes without Austrian—A Murder at the Inglau Fair—The Zingari and their Discomfiture and Execution.

"Old stories are sometimes worth retelling," said a gentleman recently. "When I was a child, ten years old, I remember a terrible murder taking place at a town in Austria, named Iglau. This place, at which I was born, is in Moravia, near the Bohemian frontier. The tragedy happened in 1850. I remember visiting the Inglau annual fair, where merchants had collected from all parts, some from the Tyrol, Switzerland, others from various parts of Austria, and even from as far north as Sweden. Temporary stores were erected by the merchants and much business done. The peasants from the Tyrol usually came in their own conveyances, bringing with them expensive shawls, laces, and other fine dry goods. The murder I allude to was committed by a band of gypsies, belonging to the Zingaris, who are numerous in Austria. The men are fine-built fellows with long dark hair, and roam around the country mending china, making mousetraps and similar small wares. Because of their nomadic habits, these Zingaris have been frequently accused of all sorts of villanies. At the time I speak of, after the fair was over, a Tyrolese farmer and his wife left Iglau for Bruun, having to pass on their way a wood about twenty miles in length. The man drove his horses, and the woman lay covered up at the back of the waggon. In the wood, at a lonely portion of the road, a band of Zingaris set upon the farmer, killing him, stabbing him in several places with their knives. The woman remained quiet, probably struck dumb with terror, and the murderers did not see her. She escaped by lying still in the waggon. They next stripped off the clothes of the murdered man—who was dressed in his national garb—tossed the body inside the waggon, and having dressed one of their comrades in the clothes in order to allay suspicion, the band withdrew, and the waggon went on its way with its new driver. The remainder of the Zingaris betook themselves to the woods. You must know that at fair times the Austrian Government has troops patrolling the high-ways that order may be maintained. The wife of the murdered man remembered this, and hung out her handkerchief saturated with her husband's blood at the rear of the waggon. A gendarme saw it, gathered his comrades, stopped the driver, found the murdered man's body, heard the wife's story, scoured the neighboring forest and seven of the gang were captured. They were brought in chains to Inglau, tried, and executed."

Stories of the Mahdi.

An Austrian who has lived since 1835 in Kassala in the Soudan, near the Abyssinian frontier, carrying on an extensive business in furnishing wild animals to menageries, zoological gardens, etc., has written a letter to the Neue Wiener Tageblatt, in which he gives some interesting details about the person and surroundings of El Mahdi, with whom he has been personally acquainted and in business relations for a number of years. He says:

Mohammed Achmed—this is the original name of the Mahdi—lived as a dealer in animals, and not as a carpenter as some have stated, in Khartoum, amassing quite a little fortune.

HIS CAREER AS AN AGITATOR.

He began with a school which he started in Tamaniat, about thirty miles north from Khartoum, and removed afterward to the Island Aba in the White Nile, south of Khartoum, where he taught his ideas and made a number of proselytes. In Aba the religious fanaticism of Mohammed Achmed was fully developed, and it was at this place that he first assumed the name of "El Mahdi," which means a man who has been shown the right way by the Lord. As early as 1880 he commenced sending out letters to the Arabian tribes in the neighborhood. One of these letters was also received by a former business friend of his in Kassala. "You must know," he wrote, "that the Lord has selected me to be the great successor, and that the prophet, the arbiter of life and death whom the Lord may bless, has proclaimed me to be the expected mahdi, and has placed me upon His throne over all the princes and nobles. And the Lord is with me himself, and has placed the insignia of my mission on my face. These are the warts upon my cheek." By the latter token, besides some others, according to tradition the Mahdi was to be recognized, but the writer is fully convinced that these warts on the right cheek of Mohammed Achmed are not natural but artificial, produced by a tonsorial artist in his service, a native of Mecklenburg, whose name is Schandarper, and is said to have been a circus clown at one time. The many

ACTS OF BARBAROUS CRUELTY,

Of which European newspapers have had so much to say, must not all be laid at the door of the Mahdi. The most of them were perpetrated by his frantic followers, whom he could not control and against whom he has become almost powerless. Through the brilliant victory which the Mahdi won in June, 1882, near Mount Gies, over Jussuf Pasha, sent with a large army to subdue the rebellion, among others a young Tyrolean, Josef Herndorffer by name, who by some accident had drifted into Jussuf's army, became the Mahdi's prisoner. This Tyrolean the Mahdi made one of his body servants, and intrusted him with the care of his tschibuks and his cigarettes. In a later expedition a lady from Paris, the wife of a French officer serving as Major under Hicks Pasha, also fell into the hands of the Mahdi. Her husband was massacred with the rest of the male prisoners, but she was installed in the harem of the Mahdi.

Anything like moral sentiment is entirely unknown among the followers of the Mahdi. For magnanimity or forbearance they have the utmost contempt; even the Mahdi would be murdered were they not restrained by superstition and a lack of appreciation of their own power. [illegible]

TO BIBLE STUDENTS.

We direct special attention to advertisement of Truth Bible Competition given in another column. It is well worth the notice of our readers.

Oh! how tired and weak I feel, I don't believe I will ever get through this Spring house-cleaning! Oh yes you will if you take a bottle or two of Dr. Carson's Stomach Bitters to purify your blood and tone up the system. In large bottles 50 cents.

Girls should ... thoroughly ... master the science of housekeeping that they shall be competent to teach their servants to carry out their plans, or, if need be, to throw themselves into the breach with ease and confidence, and, unassisted, carry on the household machinery without a jar. Brains are as necessary in housework as in anything else, and an intelligent woman can master every detail a great deal quicker than her less cultured sister, but those details should be studied in the leisure of her girlhood, and not when she has the responsibility of a new home making on her hands. This is like a physician going into practice before he has studied his profession. Women rush boldly into enterprises which it takes men years to prepare for. All our girls cannot expect to marry moneyed men, nor can they be sure, in the uncertain conditions of our modern life, that men who are rich to-day may not be poor and struggling in a short year or two; and, surely, these men have a right to expect that the woman they place at the head of the home they have, in many cases, toiled hard to win, shall be able to fulfil her duty towards that home in the true spirit, bringing it to a full comprehension of its cares and duties, and an ability, so far as it could be gained by conscientious study beforehand, to perform these duties well.

Complain as we may

About our lot in life, we cannot deny that any are exempt by their position from the common lot of pain and suffering. The highest, as well as the most humble, must be ever on the alter to take advantage of such means as will relieve when pain makes relief a necessity to our comfort. By a letter from "Government House, Ottawa," asking for a supply of Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor, we are reminded of two things; first that corns are universal, and secondly that Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor is recognized by all classes as the most certain painless, and non-poisonous remedy, for corns. Beware of the article just as good, and use only Putnam's Extractor.

One of the illusions is that the present hour is not the critical, decisive hour. Write it on your heart that every day is the best day in the year.

Not another Pill shall go down my throat again, said a citizen, "when I can get such a prompt and pleasant cure for my Bilious attacks, such as Dr. Carson's Stomach Bitters. It renders the Blood Pure and Cool and makes a splendid Spring Medicine. Large bottles 50 cents.

He is the richest man who knows how to draw a benefit from the labors of the greatest number of men, of men in distant countries and in past times.

IN THE EVENING—Farewell Concert at the Pavilion, introducing several specialties. Other attractions will be added from time to time.

Press Picnic.

The Bruce Publisher's Association met in Kincardine on Friday last. Such a crowd of "great heads" had never struck the town before and the barbarian natives were at a complete loss to appreciate such an accumulation of giant intellects. The members got together about noon and held their meeting in the Town Hall. No grievences were brought forward and the Association is stronger than ever. The meeting was particularly harmonious. Owing to the majority having entrenched themselves near the lock-up, the respectable members had hard work to discover their whereabouts. The association were very hospitably entertained by Mr. Quirk, to whom the thanks of the members are especially due, for the kind invitation to visit his beautiful residence situate on the north side of the town.

On Friday evening the Association and County Councillors were banquitted by the citizens of Kincardine. About 200 sat down to a most sumptuous repast, and the usual toasts were proposed and responded to in a most happy style. Mr. Benner, of Port Elgin, on behalf of the Press, made a few remarks which were rather inconsistant than otherwise. Mr. Seneca G. Ketchum was called upon to respond to the toast of the Ladies, but the red-headed lover of the fair sex was not to be foumd, which was unfortunate, as the ex-editor of the Hanover Post has long been recognized as an ardent advocate of the "dear gurrels."

The members of the Association expressed themselves highly pleased with the working of the organization since its inauguration in January last, and all evinced a determination to abide by the Association through thick and thin.

On the whole the semi-annual meeting was a most successful affair, and the Printers and Publishers of Bruce have every reason to feel proud of the Pioneer Association of Canada. —Bruce Herald.

AN ANSWER WANTED.

Can any one bring us a case of kidney or liver complaint that Electric Bitters will not speedily cure? THE SECRET OUT.

The secret of beauty has been at last revealed. Without good health, pure blood and a fair clear skin none can possess good looks. What is more repulsive than pimples, blotches and a sallow or pasty complexion? Burdock Blood Bitters reveal the fact that all can gain pure blood and freedom from the repulsive diseases of the skin that result from impurities.

PHIPPS was hanged Tuesday.

IMPORTANT CHANGES.

There are two periods in the life of every female when the system undergoes great changes. First the change from childhood to womanhood; next, that of womanhood to old age. These are the critical changes of life, and the system should be nourished and regulated by that matchless tonic, Burdock Blood Bitters. It is invaluable in all diseases peculiar to females.

WHAT IN A NAME?

Scrofula is so called from the Latin scrofa a pig, from the supposition that the disease came from eating swine's flesh. It is often inherited from parents, and leades to abscesses, ulcerous sores, debility, king's evil and consumption. The case of the Rev. W. Stout, of Wiarton, who suffered 23 years from scrofulous abscesses, is one of the most remarkable on record. Burdock Blood Bitters cured him after the best medical skill had failed.

The Moon Inhabited.

TOWNS, VILLAGES AND CULTIVATED FIELDS CAN BE SEEN.

At the astronomical observatory of Berlin, says a translation from Nya Pressen Helsingfor, a discovery has lately been made which, without doubt will cause the greatest sensation, not only among the adepts in science, but even among the most learned. Prof. Blendmenn, in that city, has found beyond a doubt, that our old friend, the moon, is not a mear lantern which kindly furnishes light for the loving youth and gas companies of our planet, but the abode of living, intelligent beings, for which he is prepared to furnish proofs most convincing.

The question has agitated humanity from time immemorable, and has been the object of the gratest interest. But the opinions have always differed widely, and on two minds held one and the same. Already in ancient times the belief prevailed that the moon was inhabited by some higher organized, intelligent beings, somewhat resembling man, and in order to communicate with them the earthly enthusiasts planted rows of trees several miles in length so as to form the figure of the Pythagoreen theoren. The celebrated astronomer, Schroder, in the beginning of the present century, fancied that he could detect places on the surface of the moon which periodically grew lighter and darker, and from this fact he derived the conclusion that the phenomenon was the proof of existing vegetation. During the last few decades, however, the idea of life on the moon had been held up to ridicule, and totally scorned by men of learning. But, nevertheless, it has now been proved to be correct.

By accident Dr. Bleudmann found that the observations of the moon gave but very unsatisfactory results, owing to the intensity of the light power of the moon's atmosphere, which is that strong that it effects the correctness of the observation in a very high degree. He then conceived the idea to make the object glass of the refractor less sensitive to the rays of light and for that porpose he darkened it with the smoke of camphor. It took months of experimenting before he succeeded in finding his right degree of obscurity of the glass and when finally found he then with the refractor took a very accurate photo of the moon's surface. This he placed in a sun microscope, which gave the picture of a diameter of 55⅛ feet. The revelation was most startling. It perfectly overturned all hitherto entertained ideas of the moon's surface. Those level plains which were formerly held to be oceans of water proved to be verdant fields, and what formerly were considered mountains turned out as deserts of sand and oceans of water. Towns and habitations of all kinds were plainly discernible, as well as signs of industry and traffic. The learned professor's study and abservations of old Luna will be repeated every full moon when the sky is clear, and we venture to predict that the time is not far off when we shall know more about the man in the moon than as being an agent in English politics.

Can You Talk With The Pencil.

If I had asked, can you draw? you would not perhaps have been so much interested. Yet drawing is in a great measure talking with the pencil. If one asks the way to the neighbor's, or to the next village, you can reply by using paper and pencil in a manner that will be more useful than mere words. You will start with the point where you are; direct him to take the next right-hand road, to take the next left-hand turn, after passing a large elm tree, and after crossing the bridge to keep straight on. All these points you can make upon the paper, and the inquirer, if he forgets your directions, can look at the sketch and be sure he is right. So, if you are about to build a rabbit hutch, or a bird house, make a sketch of it, that is, say upon paper just what kind of an affair you will build. If it does not suit you in some parts, rub out and draw anew, for it is much easier to make alterations in your house on paper than it is in the thing itself. Then having fixed upon the size for the house, mark down the figures, and you will be pleased to find how much easier to build, if you have the stetch at hand to tell you how. "But I can't draw"—Did you ever try? The first lesson you need is, to draw a straight line. Try to draw a horizontal line about two inches long, without the use of a straight edge or ruler. If not straight at first try again, and keep trying until you get one fairly straight. Then make another line about a quarter of an inch from the first, and then others all an equal distance apart. Next try perpendicular lines in the same manner. A few lessons in drawing lines, horizontal and upright, making a number of both at different distances apart, but all of each set an equal distance, will be very useful in educating the eye and the hand. You can also try drawing long lines, others one-half as long, and so on, first making the length by your eye, and then applying a measure. These will be capital exercises for odd times.—The Doctor in American Agriculturist for July.

Ladies Who Never Buy.

A dry goods salesman says:—We haveto endure a great deal at the hands of those ladies who never buy. These people take up valuable time, and a good part of our energies is directed to the effort to circumvent them The moment an 'old-timer' comes up to the counter she is instantly recognized by some one of the salesmen, and the warning signal, a tap on the counter, is passed along the line. Then we have some fun. The 'old-timer' will call for, say, a certain shade of yellow. She is told it is not in stock. 'Oh, what a pity!' she exclaims, 'that is just what I wanted. If you had it I would buy sixteen yards of it.' Then it is the next man's turn. He comes up accordingly, and teles the first salesman that he is mistaken, that there is still a bolt of twenty yards of that identical stuff in the store. He brings it forward and lays it down. You would think the shopper who never buys would be disconcerted at this turn of affairs. Not a bit of it. She says smilingly: 'Oh, that is just what I want. Lay it aside for me, and I will see my dressmaker and find out just how many yards she needs, and to-morrow I will come back and buy it.' Then she departs with a simper, but she never comes back. We amuse ourselves in this way, but it's a terrible nuisance all the same.

MY LADY'S MAID.

Lady Adelaide Montrevor was a somewhat faded beauty of five-and-thirty, or thereabouts, though no torture would have dragged from her the admission that she was more than six-and-twenty. Seventeen seasons had played considerable havoc with Lady Adelaide's charms. Her once brilliant complexion had sadly deteriorated under the influence of late hours and the constant use of cosmetics. Her face had become thin and angular, her teeth had begun to show an unpleasant tendency to project, and her figure had lost its once seductive roundness. But Lady Adelaide was a woman of determination and pluck, and she had long ago made up her mind that what was wanting in nature should be supplied by art.

Without entering further into particulars, it may be enough to say that her ladyship's toilet was a very difficult and lengthy process, and that one of her most essential requirements was a perfectly discreet and confidential maid. Good servants, however are hard to find, and when Brown, who had been in Lady Adelaide's service for nearly ten years, took it into her head to marry a prosperous young publican, Lady Adelaide was at her wits' end to know how to replace her. At last, after she had tried a dozen maids in six months, and was on the verge of despair, a friend recommended to her notice a certain Miss Prudence Burton, who seemed in every way fitted for the delicate position. Miss Burton was the daughter of a Nonconformist clergyman, who had left her practically penniless. She was, according to her introducer, quick, neat-handed, and clever, and what she wanted in experience she more than made up for in discretion.

"I only hope she will suit," sighed Lady Adelaide's moteer, the countess of Fixton; "its perfectly dreadful to put up with the creatures you have had lately. That wretch Jones, the other day, made your eye-brows quite different lengths, and I'm almost certain Sir Thomas noticed it."

Sir Thomas, it may be said, was an Australian millionaire who had come over to England to look after an aristocrat wife. He was a somewhat vulgar old gentleman, with a taste for jewellery and large-patterned clothes, who talked very loud, and ate and drank somewhat more than what was good for him. But Lady Adelaide could not afford to be particular, and Sir Thomas was at present the idol of her dreams.

After a lengthy interview with Lady Adelaide, Miss Burton was duly engaged, and she speedily justified the good character that her new mistress had received with her. At first, indeed, it was a little trying to her ladyship's feelings to be obliged to point out the precise use of the various bottles and pots which were kept carefully locked up in a cupboard in her bedroom, but the new maid accepted every revelation with such a delightful matter-of-fact air that the task soon became a positive pleasure.

"Poor thing," sighed Lady Adelaide sympathetically, "a little knowledge of this sort may be very useful to her some day. Her face might be made positively good-looking though heaven forbid that she should think so, and try to get married like Brown!"

Miss Burton never forgot anything she had once been told, and she speedily became an adept in the mysterious art of making up her mistress. Her taste in dress was, moreover, surprisingly correct; and such was the success of her efforts that people began to remark that in a subdued light, tempered by rose-colored lamp-globes, Lady Adelaide occasionally looked quite young and pretty.

When Miss Burton had occupied her situation about a month the object of Lady Adelaide's ambition was accomplished. Sir Thomas Jenkins was so overcome by the combined effects of the Fixton champagne, an unusual successful toilet, and the sentimental influences engendered in the conservatory of the Fixton mansion, that he made an offer of his hand and heart to Lady Adelaide, and, after a proper amount of maidenly hesitation on her part, was accepted. The course of true love promised, in their case, to run exceedingly smooth, and for a week or two all was harmony in the mansion in Grosvenor square. Sir Thomas Jenkins was quite as attentive as a gentleman of his age and habits could reasonably be expected to be, and his presents were numerous and costly. Lady Adelaide's looks and temper both improved under the softening influence and Miss Burton found her situation much less disagreeable than it had been.

One day, however, when Lady Adelaide returned from a drive in the park she found her mother crying in a subdued and ladylike fashion over an open telegram.

"Good gracious, mamma dear, what is the matter!" cried Lady Adelaide. "Anyone dead?"

"No, my dear; but poor, dear Algernon—read this," answered the countess.

Lady Adelaide took the telegram and read:

"From the deacon of Christ church to the countess of Fixton: I regret to inform you that Lord Algernon Montrover is seriously ill with typhoid fever."

"What are we to do?" cried Lady Adelaide. "How unfortunate!"

"Do? why start for Oxford at once, of course," said the countess. "We can't leave the poor boy to be looked after by scouts, and bedmakers, and such like horrible people."

"I suppose we must go," said her daughter, "but it is really very inconvenient. Algy always had a knack of doing everything at the wrong time. I don't quite see why I need accompany you though, Mamma, do you?"

"Adelaide!" said the countess, with much dignity, "I am really surprised at your want of feeling. Of course you must come too."

"But what is to become of poor Sir Thomas?" sighed Lady Adelaide, with an effort to look sentimental.

"Sir Thomas is not exactly a boy," answered Lady Fixton, somewhat spitefully; "and I suppose he can take care of himself. You can't possibly stay here alone; and your sisters are all so abominably selfish that I don't believe either of them would come down to chaperon you. Besides, whatever would people say if Algy were left to look after himself?"

This last argument was conclusive, and Lady Adelaide resigned herself to the inevitable, feeling exceedingly vicious towards the unlucky patient. The same evening Lady Fixton and her daughter, accompanied of course, by Miss Burton and an army of servants, found themselves established at the Randolph hotel.

Lord Algernon Fixton was exceedingly ill, and as typhoid is at the best a slow disease, there was not the smallest chance of the mother and daughter being able to quit their present quarters for some weeks to come. This enforced absence from London and the separation from her elderly lover were exceedingly irksome to Lady Adelaide. Sir Thomas had never shewn any signs of wavering in his fidelity, but she had had too much experience of the inconstancy of man to place an altogether implicit reliance on his affections. He was, it is true, nearly 60 years old, but he considered himself quite a young man, and had a very strong predilection for pretty faces—a weakness which Lady Adelaide had often noticed with considerable uneasiness. Under the circumstances, she did not at all like the idea of Sir Thomas being left alone for a month or six weeks in London, but she could not leave her brother, and her gallant swain, when she delicately suggested in a letter that he might take up his residence temporarily at Oxford, showed not the slightest disposition to act upon the hint.

Moreover, Lady Adelaide detested hotels, and was bored to death by the few university personages who called upon her mother. She called the place itself abominably dreary, and declared that it was impossible to buy the slightest article at any of the shops; in fact, she divided her time between writing letters to Sir Thomas and in thinking of all sorts of odds and ends which were absolutely essential to her comforts, and which must be procured on the shortest notice from some London tradesman. Many of these articles were things that could not be properly described in a letter, and so it came about that Miss Burton, who was the only person she could trust in such delicate matters, was frequently despatched to London in quest of a pair of gloves of a particular shade, a scent of some complicated nature, or an entirely new and unequalled toilet requisite. Miss Burton rather liked these expeditions, for her days at Oxford, owing to Lady Fixton's depression and Lady Adelaide's bad temper, were the reverse of cheerful. On most of her trips she was intrusted with an affectionate note for Sir Thomas, which she was strictly enjoined to deliver into his own hands. It therefore became necessary for her to call frequently at Sir Thomas' club or chambers, and wait for an answer to the dainty missive.

One day Miss Burton was sent to London with quite a sheaf of notes to deliver. Lady Adelaide had been somewhat more bored than usual, and had written to corsetmakers dressmakers, perfumers, and jewellers ordering indiscriminately all sorts of mysterious articles. Miss Burton also had the usual note for Sir Thomas, and happening in the midst of her commissions to pass through Pall Mall, she stopped her hansom at his club to deliver it. Five minutes after the note had been handed to the hall porter Sir Thomas rushed out in a remarkable state of excitement.

"What on earth is that you have given me?" he cried, regardless of appearances.

"I don't understand you, sir," said Miss Burton.

"Why, look at this!" continued the agitated knight. "It's an order for a palpitating—palpitating what?" he screamed.

"Dear me!" said Miss Burton. "I'm afraid there must be a mistake—your letter must have been put into the wrong envelope."

And opening the rest of her undelivered notes, she speedily found the missive which had been intended for Sir Thomas.

This is yours, Sir Thomas," she said, handing it to him.

But the worthy knight was still absorbed in the contemplation of the paper in his hand. "And she wears a——" he muttered slowly, and he turned on his heel and walked back into the club.

Miss Burton did not wait for an answer, but drove off to finish her commissions; bursting into uncontrollable laughter as soon as her cab had gone a safe distance from the club. Naturally enough, she did not dare to tell Lady Adelaide of this exceedingly untoward incident, and was obliged to account for Sir Thomas' remissness in not answering his lady-love's note by saying that he was out of town for the day. Lady Adelaide was much annoyed; trifles had a singular potent effect in ruffling her, so a day or two later she was again despatched to London, provided as usual with the inevitable billet-doux.

This time Sir Thomas was not at his club, so, as she had strict orders not to return without an answer, Mis Burton went round to his chambers on Jermyn street.

She gave the note to the porter and wait-for an answer in the hall.

"Sir Thomas will be glad if you will walk up stairs, miss," said the man reappearing.

Miss Burton obeyed, and was shown into a well furnished room, where Sir Thomass at at a writing table, twirling Lady Adelaide's note around his fingers.

"Sit down, my dear," said the knight in a fatherly manner. "I want to speak to you."

He paused a moment and then resumed: "Lady Adelaide seems rather a high-spirited young lady, eh?"

Miss Burton did not feel at all well toward her mistress, who, two days before, had so far forgotten herself as to box her ears, so she replied:

"Well, she is rather, Sir Thomas."

"Exactly so; leads you the very duce and all of a life, I suppose?" said Sir Thomas, familiarly.

"She has been a little put out at not hearing from you this last day or two," replied the lady's maid, demurely.

"Oh, indeed!" said the knight, with a distinct approach to a wink. "She's very fond of me, you think?"

"Very," answered Miss Burton with a scarcely perceptible smile.

"You'd like me to answer this note, wouldn't you?"

"Yes, I certainly should," replied the lady's maid.

"Very well I will; I should be sorry to get you into any more scrapes."

And Sir Thomas scribbled a brief answer and handed it to his fair visitor.

"Good-bye my dear," said Sir Thomas, staring very hard at her, and extending a substantial fist.

Miss Burton was somewhat embarrassed by the unusual honor, but she took the proffered hand and was rewarded by a squeeze which nearly elicited a scream.

The days at Oxford passed away wearily enough for the noble family of Fixton. Lord Algernon's attack of typhoid, though never positively dangerous, was extremely troublesome, and neither prayers nor entreaties from Lady Adelaide could induce the countess to leave him. Lady Adelaide became gradually more and more irritable; in fact, she treated Miss Burton so badly that if it had not been for her occasional visits to London, she would most certainly have given notice to leave.

"Don't you think it is rather imprudent of you, my dear, to send Burton so often to clubs and chambers and such like places?" inquired the countess one day.

"Good gracious, no, mamma; why on earth should she not go?" answered her dutiful daughter. "I should like to know what servants are for!"

"You may please yourself of course, Adelaide," said her mother; "but I must say that I think Burton much too good looking to be trusted about in London alone, so often."

"I don't profess to be a judge of persons in that rank of life," answered Lady Adelaide. "By the way how is Algernon this morning?"

"Going on splendidly; in fact, he hopes to be able to go to the Derby, which, I hear, comes off in a fortnight."

"I suppose we shall have to go with him?"

"Certainly; I could not think of trusting him out of sight so soon; he would be sure to do something terrible."

"Well, the Derby is a bore, but anything will be a desirable change after this awful place. I must ask Sir Thomas to meet us. You will write to Sophia to put us up?"

"As you please, my dear," answered the countess, glad to get rid of the subject.

So Lady Adelaide wrote an unusual playful and affectionate note to her future husband, bidding him meet her at her brother-in-law's house, near Epsom on the appointed day, while her mother sent word to her married daughter that she and Lady Adelaide would stay the night with her, in fulfilment of a long standing promise.

Sir Thomas answered at once that he would be delighted to obey his betrothed's, orders; and Lady Sophia intimated that she and her husband would be glad to see Lady Fixton and Lady Adelaide as suggested.

Lady Adelaide felt that after so long an absence she must do her best to make a favorable impression upon her future lord; and the choice of a suitable costume for the eventful day caused her much anxious deliberation, and the long-suffering Miss Burton many extremely bad quarters of an hour. That young lady, thought somewhat preoccupied and absent in her manner, seemed, however, perfectly satisfied with her lot; and even lady Adelaide was forced to confess that it was almost impossible to ruffle her singularly equable temper. But as the day of the Derby approached, Miss Burton showed unmistakable signs of anxiety and nervousness, which somewhat surprised her mistress.

Early on the morning they were going to leave Oxford, Miss Burton appeared with a very long face,

"The gloves, my lady, don't match your dress by at least two shades."

"Goodness me! how provoking!" said her mistress. "What an old idiot that must be! There's nothing for it but for you to go direct to London and get some more, and then join us at my sister's."

"Very well, my lady," said Miss Burton meekly.

So the maid departed, and Lady Adelaide was left to superintend the arrangements for leaving Oxford with very inexperienced assistance.

It was nearly dinner-time when Lady Fixton and her daughter arrived at Lady Sophia's and Lady Adelaide at once retired to her bedroom and sent for Miss Burton. To her great astonishment and disgust, however, she heard that the young person had not yet put in an appearance. Lady Adelaide was perfectly furious. Strange maids she always found to be clumsy and stupid, and she strongly objected to revealing the secrets of her dressing room to more people than she could help. There was, however, one consolation—the party was small, and Sir Thomas was not expected until the following morning. So she arrayed herself as best she could and went down to dinner, conscious of looking by no means her best, and in an extremely bad temper.

The evening passed and morning came, but still no Miss Burton, and not a word from Sir Thomas. Lady Sophia's villa was about three or four miles from the course, and her husband's drag had been requisitioned to convey the party thither. The hour for starting approached, and Lady Adelaide's feelings can only be imagined, not described. Everything went wrong with her; exasperating strings gave way in unexpected places, glove-buttons came off, and shoe-laces broke at the most critical moment. The countess came into her daughter's room to hasten her movements.

"My dear, you really must come. Sir Thomas will be sure to meet us on the course; and everybody is waiting."

"Bother Sir Thomas and everybody else!" said Lady Adelaide, on the verge of hysterics. "Oh, that wretched Burton! I believe I could strangle her!"

But invectives were useless, and Lady Adelaide was obliged to finish dressing as best she could, and to follow her mother down stairs.

"Jump up, Adelaide!" growled her brother-in-law; "we shall miss the first race as it is."

She mounted the drag with no little difficulty, and at length they started. Her ladyship felt cross, miserable, and bored to the last degree. The Derby did not interest her in the least, except as a means of showing off he, attractiont to the best advantage, and as neither Miss Burton had appeared to adorn her nor Sir Thomas to admire her, she felt she would have been much better at home. They arrived on the course at last, and the men grumbled deeply at being so late, especially as they were obliged to put up with a very inferior position at the end of the line of drags.

The race preceding the great event had just been run, when there was a stir among the crowd on Lady Adelaide's left. A smartly-appointed mail-phaeton was advancing with difficulty towards the line of carriages. By means of a liberal distribution of bad language and coin of the realm the driver managed to pilot his vehicle into an open space not far from the drag on which Lady Adelaide sat. The noise attracted her attention, and she glanced languidly downward. The sight she saw made her gasp with horror. There sat a rosy-faced old gentleman arrayed in gorgeous attire, with a gigantic buttonhole and a white hat, and beside him appeared to her outraged vision an exceedingly well dressed and attractive young lady, whose features were horribly familiar to her.

Turning in an almost fainting condition to Lady Fixton she gasped: "Look, mamma, there's Sir Thomas with Burton by his side. What can it mean?"

"It means, I expect, my dear, those journeys to London," added the countess with a reproachful look. "But see—Sir Thomas is coming this way with Burton on his arm."

And sure enough he walked up to the side of the drag, and making a polite bow, calmly remarked: "Lady Adelaide, allow me to introduce you to my wife—though I fancy you have met before."

Great Industrial Fair and Semi-Centennial Exposition.

This being the fiftieth or Semi Centennial year of the Incorporation of Toronto as a city, the Industrial Exhibition Association of that city have determined on making their next Annual Fair and Exposition, which is to be held from the 10th to the 20th of September next, of such a magnitude as will eclipse any of its predecessors. On account of the large number of applications already received from intending exhibitors, it has been decided to enlarge several of the buildings, and an immense programme of special attractions of a novel character is being prepared for the occasion. The Governor-General and the Marchioness of Lansdowne are to open the Exhibition on the 10th of September. Among the attractions already announced are an International Firemen's Demonstration, a Colley Show, and Field Trials by dogs, which will be of great interest to the farmers; Balloon Ascension, an Electric Railway, &c. The Manager, Mr. Hill, is to visit New York and other places next month in search of other special attractions of the latest and most interesting character. Special days have been set apart, as the Farmer's Day, the School Children's Day, the Societies' Day, &c. The Prize Lists containing full particulars of the Great Fair, have been issued, and can be obtained from the Secretaries of all Agricultural Societies and Mechanics' Institutes in the Province, or they will be sent to any one who will drop a post card to the Secretary at Toronto. See advertisement in another column. A full programme of all the special attractions will be published about the middle of August. This will undoubtedly be the greatest event of Toronto's Semi-Centennial Year.

Circumstances Alter Cases.

"Beanpod, old man, what would you do if you had $10,000?"

Beanpod was feeling blue, and the fact that he was dead broke made him meek, humble, and liable to moralize.

"Do?" he said musing. "I'd build a church, subscribe $1,000 to the monument fund, give $500 to the poor, and—"

"Well, I m glad to hear it. I am pleased to inform you that your aunt died in Harrisburg yesterday, leaving you $25,000."

"Is that so?" asked the overjoyed Beanpod. "Let's go and take a drink. By the way, how would you like to go to New York with me on a bender and help spend some of this money?"

"But how about the poor?"

"Hang the poor! I am a rich man now I was poor when I talked so hard about charity."

What is Catarrh?

From the Mail (Can.) Dec. 15th.

Catarrh is a muco purulent discharge caused by the presence and development of the vegetable parasite amœba in the internal lining membrane of the nose. This parasite is only developed under favorable circumstances, and these are:—Morbid state of the blood, as the blighted corpuscle of tubercle, the germ poison of syphilis, mercury, toxœmea, from the retention of the effete matter of the skin, suppressed perspiration, badly ventilated sleeping apartments, and other poisons that are germinated in the blood. These poisons keep the internal lining membrane of the nose in a constant state of irritation, ever ready for the deposits of the seeds of these germs, which spread up the nostrils and down the fauces, or back of the throat, causing ulceration of the throat; up the eustachian tubes causing deafness; burrowing of the vocal cords, causing hoarseness, usurping the proper structure of the bronchial tubes, ending in pulmonary consumption and death.

Many attempts have been made to discover a cure for this distressing disease by the use of inhalants and other ingenious devices, but none of these treatments can do a particle of good until the parasites are either destroyed or removed from the mucus tissue.

Some time since a well-known physician of forty years standing, after much experimenting, succeeded in discovering the necessary combination of ingredients which never fails in absolutely and permanently eradicating this horrible disease, whether standing for one year or forty years. Those who may be suffering from the above disease should, without delay, communicate with the business managers Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King Street West, Toronto, and get full particulars and treatise free by enclosing stamp.

Didn't Want the Doctor.

There was an accident on the railroad and the engineer, who was a wag, was taken from the wreck all battered to pieces.

"Bring the doctor here, bring him quick," called out a postal clerk who was holding the poor fellow's head on his knee.

"No—no," faintly moaned the wounded man, "don't do that. Ain't it enough for a fifteen-ton locomotive to fall on a fellow without calling the doctor to finish the job? Say, boys, just give a man a chance, will you?"

He got well.

Every Man and Woman

Will disagree upon some points. It is almost impossible to quite reconcile one's convictions with those of another, though, of course, exceptions occur; and one of the most notable which we can mention is that on the corn question. For once our people are united; they acknowledge that never in the history of the world was there as certain, as sure, as harmless, as prompt aremedy as Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor, and for once a united and free people have reached a sensible conclusion. Beware of substitutes.

CLOSING SEPTEMBER 11.

OPEN TO THE WORLD.

GREAT CLUB OFFER.

The Leading Rewards are Lot 50x150 at Toronto Junction, Pianos, Organs, Sewing Machines, Gold and Silver Watches, Silver Tea Sets, &c.

The proprietor of the Ladies Journal now announces a magnificent list of rewards for correct answers to Bible questions. It is surprising how little is known of the Bible. The questions are not so difficult this time as last, and there should be a hearty response. It was announced in the June issue of the Ladies' Journal that the competition which closed last month would be the last for the present, but it has been decided to try one more.

All money must be sent by post office or express. No information will be given to any one more than is stated here. So send answers, and don't waste time writing. Do not send postage stamps unless six cents is added for the discount. Remit by postoffice order, script or small coin.

THE BIBLE QUESTIONS

1.—Mention the case of a man who was sorry for loosing what he had borrowed?

2.—Mention the names of a king, a counsellor, and a scoundrel who committed suicide?

3.—Where is mention made in the Bible of a man who had on each hand six fingers and on each foot six toes?

Now, any one having a knowledge of the Scriptures ought to be able promptly to answer these questions with a little study, and so secure some one of those rewards. Bear in mind every one competing must send FIFTY CENTS with their answers, for which the Ladies' Journal will be sent one year to any address. If you answer each of the questions correctly and your answers are in in time you are sure to secure one of these costly rewards.

70 to 100—Thirty-one beautiful bound volumes Hood's Poems	[illegible]
101 to 157—Fifty-seven fine rolled gold Brooches	171 00

The list of consolation rewards will be given to the last one hundred and fifty-seven persons who send correct answers to the Bible questions given above. But bear in mind, your letter must bear the postmark where mailed of 11th September, the closing day of the competition. Fifteen days will be allowed after closing day for letters, from distant points to reach the Ladies' Journal office. But you can, of course, send in any time between now and the 11th of September, and your letter will take its place at the publication office in the order it arrives there. All letters are carefully numbered as they arrive, and there can be no mistake. If your answers are correct, and they reach there in time, you will surely get some reward in addition to The Ladies Journal, which alone is big value for the half dollar. If you don't get anything but the Journal you will be well pleased with your investment, as it consists of 20 pages of fashions, illustrated, short and serial stories, poetry, newest music, household hints, etc., etc.; in fact, just the paper to suit every lady.

By subscribing in a club with your neighbours you will secure some considerable advantage—that is, there must be least thirty in a club, and all who send correct answers to the Bible questions may have their choice of a handsome ring, heavily gold-plated ladies' gold brooch, which retails at about one dollar and a half, or a triple-plated butter knife. Either of these you may wish will be sent postage paid. You will thus secure to a certainty one or other of those two presents and in addition will have as good an opportunity of gaining some one of the other large rewards in lists given above just as well as though you had sent in singly. This is simply an inducement to get up clubs. We are sure our readers could not do better than to try their skill in hunting up these questions and competing for these rewards. Everything will be carried out exactly as promised.

Prizes in last competition went all over Canada and to many parts of the United States.

"LADIES' JOURNAL"

BIBLE COMPETITION No. 7,

CLOSING SEPTEMBER 11.

OPEN TO THE WORLD.

GREAT CLUB OFFER.

The Leading Rewards are Lot [illegible] Toronto Junction, Pianos, Organs, Sewing Machines, Gold and Silver Watches, Silver Tea Sets, &c.

The proprietor of the Ladies Journal [illegible] announces a magnificent list of rewards for correct answers to Bible questions. It is surprising how little is known of the Bible. The questions are not so difficult this time as last, and there should be a hearty response. It was announced in the June issue of the Ladies' Journal that the competition which closed last month would be the last for the present, but it has been decided to try one more.

All money must be sent by post office or express. No information will be given to any one more than is stated here. So send answers, and don't waste time writing. Do not send postage stamps unless six cents is added for the discount. Remit by postoffice order, script or small coin.

THE BIBLE QUESTIONS

1.—Mention the case of a man who was sorry for loosing what he had borrowed?

2.—Mention the names of a king, a counsellor, and a scoundrel who committed suicide?

3.—Where is mention made in the Bible of a man who had on each hand six fingers and on each foot six toes?

Now, any one having a knowledge of the Scriptures ought to be able promptly to answer these questions with a little study, and secure some one of those rewards. Bear in mind every one competing must send FIFTY CENTS with their answers, for which the Ladies' Journal will be sent one year to any address. If you answer each of the questions correctly and your answers are in in time you are sure to secure one of these costly rewards.

FOR THE FARMER.

Profits of Sheep.

There is no other farm stock that may be made so profitable as a small flock of sheep. The complaint of dogs and their destructive ravages in the flocks is no doubt true; but if more sheep were kept there would be fewer dogs. It is something like the weeds on a farm. If there were no crops, there would be nothing but weeds; but we raise crops and the weeds are kept in subjection. Just so the dogs would be kept in subjection if every farm had its flock. It is worth while considering if it would not be better to displace the pigs for twice as many sheep; for two sheep can be kept where one pig is. There would be a tender lamb for the farmer's table, a luxury now unknown; a good, sweet, wholesome mutton; lambs, too, to sell at a good price, and a score of fleeces bringing in twice as many dollars. A neighbor has a flock of sheep on his farm, but it belongs to his daughter, who cares for them and looks after the lambs and has quite a fund accumulated from the profits; but what is better still, as the farmer says, "the girl is farmer all over," and if she has no better fortune will be able to run a farm and manage a flock of sheep as well as any other farmer.—New York Tribune.

Working Horses Without Shoes.

We believe that a good deal of money is worse than wasted in the needless shoeing of farm horses; for the shoe being unnatural is always accompanied with more or less risk, especially in the hands of ignorant or careless farriers. Bad shoeing and trotting on hard pavements are among the most frequent causes of lameness in all cities; and it is not at all unusual to see valuable horses in all large cities sacrificed, after a short period of abuse, for a small fraction of their worth when sound. Such horses are often young, spirited, and valuable animals, and need only a little careful handling to recover the use of their feet in many instances.

The best treatment for such cases is to knock off the shoes, and turn the horse into pasture for a few weeks, when they will often recover sufficiently to work without shoes. Shoeing is far less needed than most persons suppose; if the horse is worked on the farm, and does not have to travel much on very stony or very hard roads, he will do better without shoes for at least eight months of the year; if the roads are quite hard, macadamized or stony, as they are in the neighborhood of the writer, horses with good sound hoofs will do a great deal of work without shoes, and suffer no injury. One of the ablest physicians of Middlesex county, who has a large practice, and is obliged to drive his horses sometimes pretty hard, finds they do better without shoes, although he lives in a district where the roads are very hard. Of course the hoof must be sound, and if accustomed to shoes must be accustomed to going without them by degrees, but when used with some care there is no difficulty in driving most horses as much as they ought to be driven over roads of average hardness without shoeing at all, for at least eight months of the year; if the work is on pavements, the case is different, especially in drawing heavy loads upon the pavements, when the shoe with calks is needed to enable the horse to hold on, and prevent slipping.

In winter when the roads are icy, the sharpened shoe must be used to prevent slipping, but on ordinary snow, until it becomes icy, there is no occasion for shoes in winter any more than in summer. The saving is not only in blacksmiths' bills, but in the greater health and soundness of the horse's feet. There are many chances to pick up valuable horses in our cities, made lame by bad shoeing, which only need to have their shoes taken off and rest for a few months to make valuable animals.—New England Farmer.

Study Farming as a Business.

The professional man spends years in fitting himself for his profession, manufacturers and mechanics learn their trades, and merchants their business, by serving years of apprenticeship with good masters, but many farmers believe that agriculture, unlike all other occupations, can be successfully carried on by those who have had no special training for the business. Indeed, a large proportion of the farms of New England are to day carried on by untrained men. Many have inherited farms, or portions of farms, from their parents. Many have remained on the old homestead out of regard to the wishes of father or mother, who thought the young folks could not be spared away from home long enough to learn a trade or profession, nor to acquire an education that would fit them for managing a farm intelligently or successfully.

It is an open question how best to educate and fit a young man to become a farmer, whether to send him to the agricultural school or college, or to allow him to serve a few years with a practical farmer who is competent to make money at his business. Both methods have their advantages and their disadvantages. A little of both sorts of training would doubtless make a better farmer of a boy than would either method alone. It is certainly foolish to undertake to carry on any business, farming not excepted, without first learning all one can learn about it. If all the men now on farms had been trained and fitted for business, as men are trained in all other vocations, farming would be looked upon by the public in a very different light from what it is at the present time. We ought to so train our boys and girls whom we hope to see settled upon farms of their own that they will be able to live by their business as other men live by theirs. It is not for us to say whether your boy shall learn the profession of farming at college, or mainly in the field, but this we do say, give your boy the very best training in your power, so that when he finally does settle down upon a farm, he will become master of his affairs.

Farming is not a business that it is safe to undertake without the same fitting and preparation that men give who follow other callings in life. When the public realise this, there will fewer poor and unsuccessful farmers in the country than there are now.

The Culture of Roses.

The best way to raise roses is to have a good-sized bed set apart for them where they can have exactly the attention they need. But it is often desirable to have a single plant in a place on the border of the lawn or elsewhere. And here it is we often see the worst errors committed, the plants being set in small holes cut through the sod, [illegible] where the grass quickly grows quite up to them and chokes their growth. When planted in grass a hole not less than two feet in diameter should be dug out, and if possible, some old stable manure dug in, and the soil below made mellow to a depth of eighteen inches. Cut away from the roots of the plant every injured part, and then reduce the top so as not to leave more than four or five buds on the main stem, and three or four on each of the branches. Set the plant so that it shall stand an inch lower than before removal, or in the case of budded roses, so that the bud shall be two inches below the surface. It may be troublesome some times to set a budded plant deep enough without having roots too low and beyond the effects of the heat that excites them to action; but the difficulty may be overcome by placing the stock in a slanting position so as to secure the covering of the union and yet keeping the roots where they will soonest become active. The practice of raising roses from cuttings is now so general that an idea has obtained a place that budded roses are quite inferior to those on their own roots, as they are called when raised from cuttings. This is not strange, since some years ago nearly all hybrid perpetuals were propagated by budding on the stock of the Manetti, a single wild rose. This is a strong grower, and quite hardy, and if by chance the budded part should be destroyed the stock immediately sends up its shoots and produces its bloom much to the dissatisfaction of the cultivator, who, not knowing exactly what has taken place, supposes he has been duped by the nurseryman or dealer, and has been supplied with a common single rose instead of the coveted double one he had ordered.

A Japanese Shave.

Of all the towns in Japan accessible to the foreigner, Kioto is by far the most interesting. There is no European quarter, and judging from the behavoir of the natives, I should say that the average of the Europeans finding their way thither in the course of a year is small. We did a good deal of miscellaneous shopping, and wherever we went there assembled a crowd of people of all ages and both sexs. They were very quiet, and not intentionally rude, but their capacity for a prolonged steady stare is infinite. What they say, did not—at least, not immediately—suggest interchange of remark. They just stood and dumbly stared, watching every slightest motion or gesture of the strange beings who had dropped from Heaven knows where upon the streets of their city.

On the night of our arrival we went to a barber's shop for a shave, necessary after four day's travel. As our jinrickshas drew up at the barber's shop the crowd began to gather, and when it was discovered that two foreigners were actually about to be shaved, the excitement throughout the quarter deepened in intensity. The crowd blocked up the narrow street, those behind trying to see over the heads of others in front, while the thrice fortunate ones in the first line flattened their noses against the window, and steamed it with their breath. Inside the shop there was a reflex of the excitement. The barber himself, though pale, was collected in manner, and gave me only one gash. But his whole family were ranged in one group in the kitchen, which opened into the shop. The assistants stood around, from time to time handing necessary articles to the operator. The most hopeless case was the small boy, whose duty it was to stand by and hand paper, combs, brush, towel, or whatever might be needed by the barber. He stood at the elbow of the chair whilst I was being shaved, with his face half a foot from mine, but lips slightly parted, and a pair of great brown eyes unnaturally extended fixed on my face. I fancy he was in a condition of modified catalespy. At any rate, he neither moved nor spoke whilst the barber rasped me, and when I vacated the chair in favor of my young friend he began afresh on him.

It was the most villanous shave I ever suffered. A dinner knife would have been for the purpose a luxurious article compared with the razor. I besought the barber to let me off, but with out avail. It was the opportunity of a life time, and he would not limit its duration by any voluntary act. Finally, when he had done with both of us, he charged one and eightpence for his fiendish work which seemed to us a very dear price for two such shaves.

Discovery of an Ancient Ruin.

Every fine day brings visitors to the place, the main attraction being Doune Castle, in Perthshire. It is not generally known that there is a far more ancient dwelling in that district than Doune Castle. At Coldoch, about two miles from Doune, is to be seen, in a good state of preservation, the remains of an underground dwelling (called a Broch) which would be unoccupied at the time Doune Castle was built. It was accidentally discovered a few years ago through the result of a storm of wind overturning a large oak tree that grew upon the old structure. The labourers on the estate were sent to remove the blown down timber, and seeing a large flat stone turned on edge by the roots of the oak, saw that there was a chamber below. Several country gentlemen subscribed a sum of money sufficient to clear out the rubbish. The inner and outer walls are still complete, also one of the arched chambers. The entrance door is intact, only the huge stone that originally shut out all foes is now laid to one side, and free access allowed through it into the amphitheatre. There can be no doubt that this structure was built before the legions of Rome placed a foot on British soil. It is built with dry stone work, the space between the inner and outer walls is roughly guessed at about 18 feet. The chambers, of which there are three, are about 7 feet long by three or four feet wide. The entrance into each of them is just large enough to allow a man to crawl in, and when once in he can stand upright. The proprietor, Mr. Graham, is very kind in granting permission to inspect the ruin to any respectable parties who ask it. There are also several standing stones in the district, the undoubted remains of the Druidical period.

"What is this, now?" asked the kindergarden teacher, as she held up a common dining plate. None of the scholars ventured an answer. "What do you eat out of at dinner when you are at home?" persisted the teacher, putting the question more directly. Still no answer. Again the question was put in the same words, and one scholar more bold than the rest, ventured to make reply. He said: "Please, 'm, a tin pan."

"I had such fun!" exclaimed little Johnnie Green. "I've been in swimming and have div under the boat." "You mustn't say 'div,' Johnnie," interrupted his elder sister, "it's incorrect. You should say 'dived.'"

"I don't see," said Noodles, "how a friend in need is a friend in deed. Now, I have got several friends in need, and they always strike me for the loan of a dollar or two whenever they meet me."

"I've raised four children chiefly on bread and butter," said a mother to a companion while sipping tea together. "Well, if it was as strong as this butter, I do not see why you shouldn't raise them," was the caustic reply.

Professor—"Mr. Jackson, do you know the monistic theory of the universe?" Mr. J.—"Yes." [Pause.] Professor—"Why don't you tell me, then?" Mr. J.—"Well, you see, there is no telling what I know." [Professor dismisses the class.]

"How are you coming on, old boy?" "Bad. I've got a fearful headache and an awful taste in my mouth. Don't you know some remedy for the misery I'm suffering from this morning?" "Yes, I know a good cure for it. Don't get drunk last night."

Lady (in an intelligence office)—"I'm afraid the little girl won't do for a nurse. She is too small. I should hesitate to trust her with the baby." Clerk—"Her size, madam, we look upon as her greatest recommendation. When she drops a baby it doesn't have far to fall."

A Vassar College girl told her professo that a fish had no lungs, but breathed with its fins. It is said that the professor went into convulsions, and was obliged to hand in his resignation. He should have given her another chance; she knew that fish breathed with their tails, but didn't stop to think.

A woman will wear a hat trimmed with birds, a sheaf of wheat, a small alligator and other articles of like description, and be perfectly happy. Yet that same woman will complain bitterly if her husband happens to come home with a plain, ordinary, everyday brick in his hat. Such, alas, is the inconsistency of woman.

"I read things that I wouldn't allow my children to read!" said Brown. "Of course I do. How should I know what to keep out of their hands if I didn't?" "Very true," replied Fogg; "your reading teaches you what to keep from your children, but how the duce do you know what to recommend to them?"

"Remember the poor," says an exchange. We will. We do. We can't forget him. He charged us two dollars a cord for sawing wood and cut every last stick of it four inches too long for any stove in the house. We remember him. And he'll remember us, if we can ever find him, and hire a man to hold him while we stave him to death.

A merchant traveller at dinner requested the waiter to bring him a piece of rare beef, and, when it came, it was rare indeed. "Waiter?" he remarked, warningly, as he looked at the undone dish. "Yes sah," responded the darkey. "Take this beef out, please, and kill it." The waiter crawled into a napkin ring and disappeared.

Some of the students at the University of Texas are more given to drinking wine than to pursuing their books, but some of them are very industrious. One of them, on being invited to play a game of billiards, declined. "Why, what's the matter!" "I've quit all that. I get up at 5 and study three hours. After breakfast I go to hear Professor Roberts' law lecture. In the afternoon I study five more hours, and I never quit my books before 11 o'clock at night. I study seventeen hours a day." "Why, man alive, that's too much. That's enough to kill a mule. But you don't look as though you overworked yourself. You are as fat as a buck, and your complexion is rosy. How long have you been studying seventeen hours a day?" "I am going to begin to-morrow," responded the over-worked student.

Parasols.

A wonderful aid to the ordinary Summer attire is to be found in the parasol. For an afternoon drive its potency is marvelous, either as an auxiliary in the massing of color, or as a kind of refuge behind which may retreat a bonnet of questionable freshness or with possibly a suggestion of last year's fashion in its proportions. A pink-lined parasol with a border of white lace is wont to diffuse a charming roseate hue over the palest cheek, and shed at the same time a festive air over the most primitive dress. Pompadour silks and satins, striped satin of black and white, gold and blue, and different shades of green, velvet embossed flowers in colors as well as in black, and brocaded bunches of flowers on a delicate-tinted ground, are all to be found on the counters of the principal shops. Even the old-fashioned parasol covers, in white Irish point and black Chantilly lace, are once more revived. An adherence to ancient tradition in respect to parasol handles, would be a comfortable and judicious ruling of fashion. The slim attenuated handle of a few years past is certainly more convenient than the short, thick and heavy stick which is now so awkward to hold. Its weight, too, is a constant strain on the wrist, and in sheer fatigue the heat of the sun's rays is at times tolerated, and of two evils considered the most endurable. The mania for wooden handles which has prevailed recently, is, perhaps, the cause of this change for the worse, for in ivory, tortoise shell and coral the parasol stick is sufficiently light. Flowered and figured sateens still maintain their popularity for sunshades and umbrellas. They are easy to hold and are less liable to fade than those of more costly material.

An English Sunday Morning in Summer.

After a hundred years if the Seven Sleepers awoke on an English Sunday morning, they would certainly at once know what day it was. There is nothing else like it for the feeling of intense repose. No other stillness can compare with the deep calm of a Sunday morning such as this. No leaf stirs; there is no cloud moving about in the hot hazy blue; the clatter of the iron road has ceased, the very birds are still. Swallows alone are ever on the wing, and the silence is so profound that the beat of their wings can be heard as they dart past in rapid course. The busy cornfields lie empty in a golden rest. Only here and there, where the harvest is not yet gathered in, the sheaves, like praying hands, stand together on the field. In the green pastures the grazing cattle seem to tread with hushed and silent step. And there is a sound of church bells on the air, coming clear yet faint across the level country.

[illegible] FOR SUNDAY CONTEMPLATION.

Do not wait to strike till the iron is hot, but make it hot by striking.

The sufficiency of thy merit is to know that thy merit is not sufficient.

Pride is increased by ignorance. Those assume the most who know the least.

Fame comes only when deserved, and then is inevitable as destiny, as it is destiny.

Modesty is to merit as shades to figures in picture, giving it strength and beauty.

A miser grows rich by seeming poor; an extravagant man grows poor by seeming rich.

It is one proof of a good education and of true refinement of feeling to respect antiquity.

Politeness is like an air cushion. There may be nothing in it, but it eases our jolts wonderfully.

As the fire-fly only shines when on the wing, so is it with the human mind—when at rest it darkens.

Defect in manners is usually the defect of fine perception. Elegance comes of no breeding, but of birth.

The beauty that addresses itself to the eyes is only the spell of the moment. The eye of the body is not always that of the soul.

Good nature is the very air of a good mind, the sin of a large and prosperous soul, and the peculiar soil in which virtue prospers.

There are few, very few, that will own themselves in a mistake, though all the world deem them to be in downright nonsense.

By struggling with misfortunes we are sure to receive some wounds in the conflict; but a sure method to come off victorious is by running away.

Sincerity is like travelling in a plain, beaten road, which commonly brings a man sooner to his journey's end than by-ways, in which men often lose themselves

Incivility is not a vice of the soul, but the effect of several vices—of vanity, ignorance of duty, laziness, stupidity, distraction, contempt of others, of jealousy.

Indolence is a delightful but distressing state; we must be doing something to be happy. Action is no less necessary than thought to the instinctive tendencies of the human frame.

Self-distrust is the cause of most of our failures. In the assurance of strength there is strength, and they are the weakest, however strong, who have no faith in themselves or their powers.

When the most insignificant person tells us we are in error we should listen and examine ourselves and see if it is so. To believe it possible we may be in error is the first step toward getting out of it.

French and English Detectives.

In England we have a curious but very erroneous idea that if a policeman wears a suit of plain clothes instead of his regular uniform he is fully able to find out all about any crime that has ever been committed. A greater mistake was never made. Not only to the "dangerous classes," but to almost every Londoner who is anything of an observer regarding his fellow-men, "plain-clothes" officers, as our detectives are called, are actually as well known as if they wore the helmet, blue tunic, and black leather waist-belt of the regular policeman. It is quite otherwise in France. A French detective has nothing whatever to do with serving summons or warrants. He never arrests a criminal, but he points out to the regular police where criminals are to be found. It is only on very rare occasions that he even appears as witness against a prisoner, and when he does so he assumes for the future a dress and general appearance quite unlike what he has hitherto borne. A French detective who cannot disguise himself in such a manner that his oldest friend would not be able to recognize him is not deemed worth his salary. He takes the greatest professional pride in this art. In a word, the French detectives are the spies sent by the army of law and order to find out all about the enemy that is constantly waging war against life and property. In England we have no similar set of men, and what are the consequences? Why, that unless a murderer, burglar, or other offender is either taken red-handed, or leaves behind him some very plain marks as to who he is or where he is to be found, crime with us is, as a rule, undetected. Sooner or later, notwithstanding our national prejudices against all that is secret and underhand, we must adopt a system for the detection of crime on the plan that is found to work so well in France, and the sooner we do so the better, unless we want to make England in general, and London in particular, more than even it is now, the happy hunting-ground of all the scoundrels in Europe. All Frenchmen who have visited our country say that our ordinary police is the very best in the world; that the manner in which they preserve order in the streets is above praise; and they are right. Nor can a word be said against the character, the integrity, or the intentions also of our detectives. But the system on which they are trained is essentially bad. They are the wrong men in the wrong place—the square pegs in the round holes.—Chamber's Journal.

The Origin of Stays and Corsets.

"To do as others do,"—others being equivalent to the majority of people—is instinctive with nearly all of us. Fashion and Mother Grundy have been left to decide our manners, our clothes, the size of our establishments, and the number of our servants. And, as a whole, there is not much to grumble at. Only now that dress reformers and some of the extreme sanitarians are telling us that women's dress is unhealthy, that there is no rhyme or reason why they should wear stays or skirts, and that both are injurious, we naturally begin to wonder why Mother Grundy ever allowed them to be treated as necessities, and why she is now opposed to their abolition. The truth is, Mother Grundy must go with the times; she is as much led as leading. Mother Grundy, when she lived in Athens, induced the Greek girls to emulate the Venus of Milo because this was the fashionable figure, and now, through long centuries, she has prescribed an artificial type of figure. It is not our present object to say whether her teaching is good or bad, injurious or beneficial; we only show how, through centuries [illegible], her dictates have been observed, and how the corset of to-day has been evolved.

[illegible] CROWN.

The [illegible] Diadem that Adorns Her Majesty's Brow on State Occasions.

The state crown of her Majesty Queen Victoria was made by Rundle & Bridge in 1838, with jewels taken from old crowns, and others furnished by command of the Queen. It consists of diamonds, pearls, rubies and sapphires and emeralds, set in silver and gold; it has a crimson velvet cap with ermine border, and is lined with white silk, and weighs about forty ounces troy. The lower part of the band above the ermine border consists of a row of 129 pearls, and the upper part of the band a row of 112 pearls, between which, in front of the crown, is a large sapphire, purchased for the crown by George IV. At the back is a sapphire of smaller size, and six other sapphires (three on each side), between which are eight emeralds. Above and below the several sapphires are fourteen diamonds, and around the eight emeralds 128 diamonds. Between the emeralds and sapphires are sixteen trefoil ornaments containing 160 diamonds. Above the band are eight sapphires, surmounted by eight diamonds, between which are eight festoons, consisting of 148 diamonds. In front of the crown, and in the centre of a diamond Maltese cross is the famous ruby, said to have been given to Edward, Prince of Wales, son of Edward III., called the Black Prince, by Don Pedro, King of Castile, after the battle of Najera, near Victoria, 1367. The ruby was worn in the helmet of Henry V, at the battle of Agincourt, 1415. It is pierced quite through, after the Eastern custom, the upper part of the piercing being fitted up by a small ruby. Around this ruby, to form the cross, are seventy-five brilliant diamonds. Three other maltese crosses, forming the two sides and back of the crown, have emerald centres and contain each 132, 124 and 130 brilliant diamonds. Between the four maltese crosses are four ornaments in the shape of the French fleur de lis, with three rubies in the centre and surrounded by rose diamonds containing respectively eighty-five, eighty-six, and eighty-seven rose diamonds. From the Maltese crosses issues four imperial arches composed of oak leaves and acorns, the leaves containing 728 rose, table and brilliant diamonds, twenty-two pearls forming the acorns, set in cups of fifty-four rose diamonds and one table diamond. The total number of diamonds in the arches and acorns is 108 brilliants, 116 table and 559 rose diamonds. From the upper part of the arches are suspended for large pendant, pear shaped pearls, with rose diamond caps, containing twelve rose diamonds, and stems containing twenty-four very small rose diamonds. Above the arch stands the mound, containing in the lower half 304 brilliants and in the upper 244 brilliants, the zone and arc being composed of thirty-three rose diamonds. The cross on the summit has a rose-cut sapphire in the centre, surrounded by four large brilliant diamonds and 108 smaller ones.

An Estimate of John Bright.

He is not known, and he never will be known, as a great administrator, as a great legislator, or as a great master of parliamentary detail. He cannot even be considered a debater of the first order. He is a man, however, just as indispensable to the legislation which has been accomplished during his career as the minister who conducts a bill through Parliament. As an orator he has acquired an equal renown in the House of Commons and on popular platforms. Such are the power and fervor of his eloquence that it has always constituted a force with which responsible statesmen have been compelled to reckon. Disraeli once said of Cobden that "he was the greatest politician that the upper middle class of England had produced, and that he was not only an ornament to the House of Commons, but an honor to his country." It may be asserted of Mr. Bright that he has surpassed all his contemporaries in the art of giving simple and weighty expression to the views and aspirations of the English multitude. He has been called a demagogue. As a matter of fact no man was ever less of a demagogue. Had he been capable of pandering to the popular sentiment of the hour, he would not have resisted the Ten Hours Bill, nor would he have lost his seat for Manchester twenty-seven years ago by denouncing the foreign policy of Lord Palmerston in China and in Russia. It would be unjust to say of him that he was ever the mere mouth-piece of public feeling. He has acted as the champion of the popular cause just so far as he could identify that cause with, and vindicate it by reference to, what have seemed to him to be the eternal laws of justice and right. There were Radicals before Mr. John Bright. There are, and will continue to be, Radicals after him. But as he had little in common with many of those who were spoken of as his allies at the beginning of his public life, so he has slight sympathy with the most powerful and representative Radicals whom he sees round him as the shadows of his life begin to lengthen.—T. H. S. Escott, in the July Century.

Mean Honesty.

George came running into the house one day, sobbing as though his heart would break.

"Why, Georgey!" exclaimed his mamma, starting up in alarm, "whatever is the matter?" [Note—She said, "what is the matter?" but she would have said "whatever" had she known that her words would be seen in print.]

"I have done a naughty, mean thing," cried George, his tears breaking out afresh.

"There, dear, don't cry! Tell it all to mamma."

Thus urged the little fellow told his story, with downcast eyes, with many a mighty sob.

He had found a pocketbook with ever and ever so much money in it. It had a name in it which showed him that it belonged to Mr. Soulless, the rich merchant, who lived five miles out of town. George had walked out to Mr. Soulless' place and found the owner in a state bordering on distraction. He had lost his pocketbook, with nearly a thousand dollars in it. Said George:

"When I gave him the pocket-book he was so glad! He didn't notice me at first, but after counting the money and finding that none was missing, he said I was an honest boy, and handed me a five cent piece, telling me to keep that for my honesty."

"And oh, mamma," continued George, "I can't help thinking what a mean little honesty I must have when it's only worth a nickel."

The Standard.

MARKDALE JUNE. 26, 1884.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

In the absence of the pastor, the Rev. Mr. McDowell, who was for the past two weeks attending the conferences of the church. The pulpit work has been very efficiently sustained by local talent. Mr. Thomas Osborn who has for many years been a zealous worker and lay preacher, occupied the pulpit in the morning, and Dr. Christoe very acceptably in the evening last Lord's day.

Rev. Mr. McGregor, Baptist Minister, preached a very earnest and thoughtful sermon on "Temperance," in the Town Hall, last Sabbath morning, selecting for the foundation of his discourse the words found in Habak kuk, II. chap., 15th verse, "Wo unto him that giveth his neighbor drink." At the close the speaker made a very earnest appeal to the people to come out boldly and go forward fearlessly in the struggle for Right, Religion and Temperance. We would be pleased to see more of our ministers take the same position as Mr. McGregor, and thus bring through a very proper channel to the people this very important question, Temperance.

We hope and expect to see a monster pic-nic of Temperance people here on Dominion Day. Come one—come all and let us have a grand gala day.

Mr. Bunt, of Wellington, has been spending a few days in this village with his brother-in-law, R. J. Sproule, Esq Mrs. Bunt intends remaining with her sister Mrs. Sproule, for a short time.

Priceville.

From our own correspondent.

Preparations for the celebration of Dominion Day are being made on an extensive scale. Proceeds to be applied to the Presbyterian church; rather a new departure.

The Messrs. Watson are re-building their workshops recently destroyed by fire.

Priceville school examination will take place Friday 27th, parents and guardians should attend; Mr. Dickson and Miss Nichol are very efficient teachers of mind morals and habits.

Our enterprising townsman Mr. James is doing a thriving business in the manufacture of leather, he also turns out a superior article in harness.

The Scott Act is commonly discussed and will likely be in force e'er long.

Meaford Road.

From our own correspondent.

At a meeting of the officials and friends of the Sabbath School it was decided to have an excursion to Owen Sound, on the 3rd July instead of pic-nic, but it appears this has not met with the approval of some parties who (as usual) stayed at home from the meeting, consequently another meeting has been called, and it is to be hoped that they will either attend or abide by the decision of those who do.

Mr. J. W. Cooey lost a valuable cow recently which adds to his many misfortunes.

Crops are looking well, the rain of Monday 16th and Sunday 23rd did much good.

E. Brodie has been laid up for a week with a cut foot, he is however about again.

Mrs. Johnston is visiting friends in this neighborhood.

Flavor and Taste.—The Difference.

Mrs. Mulcahy paid an afternoon visit to her bosom friend, Mrs. McTaggert, the other day, and when the latter was preparing a cup of the liquid that cheers every good house-wife's soul, the former inquired where the leaf had been purchased; "for," said Mrs. M., "they've got the knack ov docthrin' an' druggin' the tay so that ye can't tell by the flavor; but the minit ye git in yer mouth it reveals itself. An' so wid ivery article in the grocery line—so that's the reason I buy all me groceries at Benson's."

Mrs. T.—"Hechs, an' so wud I if they hadn't quit the business."

Mrs. M.—"But sure, hasn't the young fellow, Bob, begun again in McIntyre's ould stand—there's where ye'll go."

DOWN IN DIXIE.

The wife of Mr. J. Kennedy, dealer in drugs in Dixie, was cured of a chronic coug by Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam. The [illegible] throat and lung dealer knows.

Personals.

Mr. Jesse S. Mabee and Mr. Robson of Albion Township visited Markdale this week.

Mr. John Colwell of Gault was in town this week.

We had a friendly call on Wednesday from Mr. J. Elliott of Wroxeter, formerly of Markdale.

Mr. Hall of the Dundalk Herald gave us a call Wednesday.

Moved by Mr. Norton, seconded by Mr. Williscroft, That the prayer of the above petition be granted by giving an order on the Treasurer for $10.

Moved and seconded that the Council adjourn till the 10th of July.

CARSON PRICE, Clerk.

MARKDALE will celebrate Dominion Day, by horse races, games and sports, Bicycle race, Tug of War &c., Great interest is expected in the tug of war between Glenelg and Holland against Artemesia and Euphrasia, six men from each township, the prize is $12, to the winning team. The Bicycle race will also be something new and interesting while the ladies pacing exhibition around the course will be most interesting and will doubtless stimulate a greater number to practicing that wholesome exercise, on the noble animal, the horse.

UNKNOWN TO SCIENCE.

That preperation is undiscovered which can surpas Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry as a cure for Cholera Morbus, Dysentery and summer complaints.

A WARNING.—At last Devision Court we entered a case against a man who subscribed for the paper, took it a certain length of time and then returned it, we suppose because it supported Blyth too strongly. He had to pay $1.50 and expenses instead of $1. We have been cheated out of dollars upon dollars in this way, in future if a man doesn't pay, we shall make him. Our business is all we have to depend on to pay our own debts, and we have no rich politician to fall back upon, for assistance if we get in trouble. A word to the wise is sufficient; in many cases, it is thoughtlessness, in others meanness, half the rascals who go to the States sneak off without paying for their paper, in future we will chronicle each skipper.—Durham Chronicle.

THE 12TH OF JULY.—Holland District comprising six lodges have decided to celebrate the Battle of the Boyne at Williamsford Station the coming 12th.

WILLIAMSFORD will celebrate Dominion Day by horse races, games and sports, for which prizes will be awarded, and will wind up with a grand hop in the evening.

MR. THOS. EDWARDS of the 6th line Glenelg plowed up a field which he had this spring seeded twice with oats, and sowed it with barley last week.

GEO. GRANT & Co. of this village have received another larger order for doors and window sash from Port Arthur, they have promptly filled the order.

THE Semi-annual meeting of Grey Division Grange No. 2, will meet at the farm at R. J. Doyle's, Esq., near Owen Sound, on Thursday next, the 3rd July.

THE Millrights are making satisfactory progress putting in the rollers in Mr. Ford's mill, and the new process is expected to be in operation in about two weeks.

MR. WARDELL, who is now in this district drilling wells, has been very successful in finding a good supply of water in the various places where he has drilled.

THE Queen's Hotel at Port Arthur was burnt last Saturday morning. Wm. Macpherson, a commercial traveller from Winnipeg, was burned to death. The total loss is $25,000; insurance, $14,000.

MANITOBA CROPS.—According to the first official crop report of the season for Manitoba, there is good prospects for an increase in the wheat crop of 2,000,000 bushels over last year. Oats is largely decreased.

BEST YET.—Henry Boyce of Glenelg made the best fishing of the season on Monday last in Rowe's lake, Holland with hook and line, he took in 51 speckled beauties which weighed 35 lbs six of them measured 18 inches.

WHEN you visit Markdale on Dominion Day don't forget, but call at Benson's Grocery and Liquor Establishment. They have a fresh stock of Groceries and Liquors which they will sell cheap for cash.

THE contents of the Revere Hotel was sold under the hammer on Monday for rent and other claims. Haskett Bros. are now re-fitting the premises throughout which will be again opened in a short time.

WE have received a copy of the prize list of the Toronto Industrial exhibition to be held from the 10th to the 20th of September. It is gotten up in usual neat and attractive style, and contains all necessary information in reference to the coming Exposition.

MR. T. B. McCOMB, of Meaford, is coming to Markdale about the 1st July to remove buildings. Those in need of any such work will do well to see Mr. McComb, as he is a capital hand and has the necessary machinery for making a safe and complete job.

THE Markdale cattle fair in July is expected to be by far the largest yet held in Markdale, Messrs. James Bennett and Henry Savage, extensive drovers of Orangeville have promised to be on hand and other strangers are expected to be here together with the local buyers. Remember Saturday the 5th July.

BEFORE another paper is issued the pathmasters in the village will likely have their work all complete for the year, and we hope to see the rubbish, caused by tearing up old sidewalks &c., together with all rolling stones cleared off the streets thereby leaving an aspect of neatness and finish about their work.

EAST GREY PRIZE LIST.—The copy for East Grey Agricultural Prize List came to hand last Saturday for printing and will be ready this week for distribution. It contains in all, over twenty pages and is got up neat and attractive. The directors who have examined the pamphlet are highly pleased with the job.

STRAWBERRIES &c.—There will be a Sabbath School pic-nic and strawberry festival in connection with the Methodist S. S. in Markdale, on Friday afternoon the 4th July. Strawberries and ice-cream served from 5 to 8.

C. O. O. F.—THE Owen Sound, Chatsworth, Williamsford Station, and Walter's Falls, Oddfellows excurt to Markdale to-day (Thursday), a large gathering is expected and we hope a pleasant time will be spent. Let each citizen do what they can to make the pic-nic an enjoyable one.

THAT PARABLE.—The Editor of the Advance makes a feeble effort to prove his charge, viz., that the parable referred to is blasphemous. Evidently it struck him in a tender spot, as well as his informer, hence the animosity displayed. Considering where it comes from we do not deem his vapourings worthy of further notice.

THE Chatsworth correspondent to the O. S. Advertiser says:

"A number of young men, while returning home from a party near Holland Centre a few mornings ago encountered a bear and three cubs. The old bear showed fight and managed to escape as also did two of the cubs, but the third one was treed and put an end to with a shot gun."

THE many friends of Mrs. John Rowe, will be pleased to hear of her safe arrival in her new home in Manitoba, having met her husband in Brandon, and proceeded 80 miles beyond to their present location. Mrs. R. expresses herself, in a letter, as highly pleased with the country and the people, her expectations being more than realized.

MR. JOHN McKENNA has purchased a lot opposite the Revere Hotel, and is making active preparations to erect a large blacksmith shop thereon. Mr. McKenna is a good mechanic, an honorable business man and a desirable citizen and we are glad the late fire, in which he suffered heavy loss, did not cause him to leave our village.

GARDEN PARTY.—The Ladies of Christ Church will have a lawn party in Mr. G. Walker's orchard on the evening of Dominion Day, there will be music provided and various amusements, together with refreshments, consisting of ice cream, lemonade, strawberries, &c., Admission to grounds including refreshments 25 cts. Children 15 cts. Gate open at 6:30 P. M.

OFFICIAL CELEBRATION QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.—The Ontario Gazette contains the following public notice:—"Saturday, the 26th day of June, instant, having been fixed by His Excellency the Governor-General for the official celebration of the present year, of her Majesty's birthday, public notice is hereby given that his Honor the Lieutenant-Governor has been pleased to direct that all public offices be closed on that day."

BARHEAD MILLS.—Since Mr. W. J. Rowe, purchased the above mills he has overhauled the saw mill and put in new machinery throughout an added a circular saw, and is now running it every night while he runs the grist mill during the day. He has a fine stock of logs in the yard and will do a good season's work. We are pleased to be able to note the above improvements in reference to Mr. Rowe who is well and favorably known as a man of honor as well as push.

CHURCH OPENING.—The Presbyterian church at Flesherton will be opened next Sabbath, 29th June, Rev. Mr. Smith, of Toronto will preach at 10:30 p. m. and 6:30 p. m. and Rev. D. C. McDowell at 2:30 p. m. Collections will be taken up at each service. A tea-meeting will be given in the Basement from 4 to 7, Tuesday evening the 1st July, after which the Rev. Mr. Smith will deliver his popular lecture, "The sins of the Pew" in the Church.

WE exceedingly regret to have this week to publish the death of Mrs. John Cæsar of this village, deceased was but a few days ill, being taken with pleurisy which was followed by inflamation and congestion of the lungs and liver, and despite the efforts of medical skill, death claimed its victim on Sunday afternoon. Mrs. Cæsar was but 29 years of age and leaves a husband and five small children to mourn her premature demise. Mr. Cæsar has the sympathy of the community in his sad bereavement. The remains were taken per noon train on Monday to Toronto, and buried in the family plot in Mount Pleasant on Tuesday.

GOOD THE YEAR ROUND.

At all seasons, when the system is foul and the digestion worses feeble, or the liver and kidneys inactive, Burdock Blood Bitters are required.

INVALUABLE TO EVERY LADY!

"MAY DEW"

The Great French Lotion for Beautifying the Face.

It conceals the evidence of age. One application will make the most stubbornly red and rough hands beautifully soft and white. Remember that "MAY DEW" is not a paint or powder that fills up the pores of the skin, and that is injurious to the skin, but a new and great discovery, a vegetable liquid, that causes the cheek to glow with health, the neck, arms and hands to rival the Lily in whiteness. Impossible to detect in the beauty it confers any artificial character. It cures greasy Skin, Freckles, Wrinkles, Pimples, Black Heads, Crow's Feet, Blotches, Face Grubs, Sun Burn, Tan, Ringworm, Chapped Hands, Sore or Chapped Lips, Barber's Itch, Tetter, etc. It frees the pores, oil glands, and tubes from the injurious effects of powders and cosmetic washes. By its use all redness and roughness are prevented; it beautifies the skin, and will make it soft, smooth and white; imparting a delicious softness; imparting a perfectly healthy, natural and youthful appearance. The best face lotion that the world ever produced. We will send "A LARGE BOTTLE" to any address on receipt of price, $1. When ordering mention this paper

MARKDALE Steam Woollen Mill.

The undersigned would respectfully return thanks to their many customers and friends for the very liberal support accorded to them during the past, and would solicit a continuance of the same, as we are now ready to attend to all work intrusted to our care in CUSTOM CARDING, FULLING and WEAVING in first-class style. As we have put on new cards, and made other improvements, we will endeavor to do as good work in the future, if not better, than we have ever done in the past.

Customers wishing to have their wool carded, spun and made into blankets or flannel, on cotton warp, can have their orders attended to by leaving their wool as early as possible.

Please remember the place, Mill Street, west of the Railway Station.

Horse Racing on Sunday—Hard Times in London—The German Militia System—An Old Soldier &c., &c.

Temperance men in England complain that as bars ginger ale costs twice as much as the same quantity of beer.

The directors of the Chicago Driving Park have resolved that hereafter races shall be run on Sunday as well as on any other day.

One hundred and forty-seven thousand persons visited the reading room, in 1882, of the British Museum and only 70,000 that of the Paris Public Library.

It seems that the report that there was a plot to destroy by dynamite the German Emperor at the inauguration of the Niederwald monument, although at first contradicted, is quite true.

A meeting of the Paris bar has passed a resolution—which, of course, has no legal effect—that the receiver of a letter has the right to publish it without the consent of the writer or his heirs.

The first "Secretary of Scotland" will probably be Lord Aberdeen. Lord Rosebery is an abler man, but as the appointment does not carry a seat in the Cabinet, it is not likely that he will accept it.

Some time ago Mr. Ellis Lever, of Manchester, England, offered a prize of $2,500 for the best safety lamp for use in mines. Over ninety lamps have been sent in, many coming from the United States and others from the Continent.

The London Religious Tract Society knows that last year it issued 30,000,000 tracts, and that its "trade receipts" were $948,155, but unfortunately it cannot say how many persons read the tracts or benefited by their perusal.

In the course of last year the German Lifeboat Society saved 277 lives, the rescued persons belonging to 47 German vessels, and to 5 English, 4 Dutch, 4 Swedish, 3 Danish, and 2 Russian ships. The Society supports 87 lifeboat stations.

The National Library of France can boast about a million more books than that of England, but then it had a start of about a century. As early as 1617 a decree was made compelling publishers to forward to it every book they published.

There is at present a great dearth of Protestant theologians in Germany. Very few young men choose the Church as a profession, and, according to a recent account, the pulpits of several country parishes are vacant literally for the want of a pastor.

A sign of the impecunious times in London is the substitution at the clubs of a nip of whiskey for 6 cents in lieu of sherry and bitters for 12. The receipts for wines and liquors in most clubs have, by reason of blue ribbonism going hand in hand with hard times, sensibly decreased.

It is said that only one small herd of buffaloes remain in Texas. This has been feeding on the Pecos River, in the Staked Plains region, but a band of hunters is hovering about it continually, killing the animals as fast as the meat can be cared for, and its days are numbered. This is the remnant of what was known a few years ago as "the great Southern herd."

Col. Malczewski, who died lately at his house in Prussian Poland, was 100. While serving in the Prussian army he was taken prisoner, and forthwith entered the French army and took part in many of Napoleon's campaigns. After Waterloo he went home, but in the rising of 1830 entered the Polish army, and, being taken prisoner, passed 47 years in Siberia. He was only released in 1879.

M. Pasteur officially announces that his researches have led him to the important discovery that if the poison of rabies is introduced into the bodies of monkeys it is greatly diminished in its virulence, and that in this milder form it may by inoculation be introduced into the bodies of other animals without producing any serious evil, but, on the contrary, destroying the liability to canine madness.

The heirlooms of Blenheim, which the Duke of Marlborough is trying to sell, include one of the very few services of solid gold plate existing in England. The Queen and the Dukes of Buccleuch and Wellington are understood to be almost the only persons possessing them.

There are in Great Britain three State papers, the London, Edinburgh, and Dublin Gazettes. The first makes a large income by reason of the various notices which the law requires to be inserted in it. Besides these papers there there is the official police "Hue and Cry" for each country.

An advertisement in the Paris Figaro announces that a man of 35, titled, intelligent, and energetic, would accept any situation, even one perilous and requiring him to go far away, or marriage, in return for the payment of $20,000 of debt. Any one who wants him must write to B. L. H. Poste Restante, Rue Montaigne, Paris.

The juvenile inhabitants of Berlin have grown so musical in their tarts that a petition to the city Police Department is now in circulation requesting that the practice of the art be by ordinance confined to such hours as will least interfere with the intellectual pursuits of the neighbors, who consider the eternal thrumming an insupportable nuisance.

A German, now resident in England, says that, having served for six years in the German army, he can confidently say that the military system of that country constitutes the most cursedly tyrannical form of slavery that ever disgraced a civilized nation. Is it any wonder that England and the United States are completely overrun by Teutons anxious to taste abroad the sweets of freedom which they can never enjoy at home?

An eminent English Mint official, who prides himself on his ability as a coiner, states that England at the present time is losing a million a year on silver money, and that the calling in of the condemned half sovereign will cost her $250,000 a year for some years. The recoining of old sovereigns into new ones also entails a heavy loss. The only paying department at the Royal Mint is that from which the bronze coinage is issued, and that shows an annual profit of $300,000. While England is thus losing in gold and silver, it must be satisfactory to feel that, in what one of her Aldermen called the other day "the merry, merry brown," she is doing a money-making business in many more than one.

The deep-sea fishes taken by the United States Fish Commission steamer during its late cruise in the Caribbean are exciting much interest at the Smithsonian. Curiosity is intensified by those specimens of deep sea fishes which are nearly or entirely blind—the eyes becoming atrophied or obsolete from disuse, like those of the fish inhabiting the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky—while others have large eyes, and the blind fish of the cave are allied to some superficial marine fishes that have well-developed eyes.

A London paper, in its account of the meet of the Coaching Club, says the Earl and Countess of Shrewsbury were conspicuous by having no guests on their coach, and they did not join the gay procession that wended its way to Hurlingham afterward. It will be remembered that Lord S. eloped with Mrs. Mundy, nee Morewood. What, however, has tended most of all to put England's premier Earl out of society has been his heartless conduct to his mother. It is said that on this account the Prince of Wales cut him dead.

An ill-timed cough or sneeze has often involved unpleasant consequences, but Mme. Dodieau came to grief the other day through merely a sigh. This lady, tired of her husband, a master butcher of Havre, eloped with a young man in his employ, after she had provided funds for a good time out of the butcher's cash box to the extent of $2,000. M. Dodieau's telegram brought a detective to the fugitive's hotel in Paris. There he found in bed a solitary young man, who swore roundly at him for violation of domicile. The officer was about to retire, when a half-stifled sigh arrested him. Search revealed a cunningly concealed closet, on opening which the erring and straying butcheress fell, half fainting into his arms.

A Big Blast.

The other day a crowd assembled at the limestone quarry north of Warm Springs to witness the discharge of a big blast, says the Salt Lake Tribune. Stone had been quarried out so as to leave a paling one hundred feet wide and over one hundred feet high. This face was nearly perpendicular, but had a bench or step extending up from the base forty feet. From this point a tunnel was run in on the dip of the ledge forty-three feet, and at the lower end a cross-cut forty-three feet long was made. At each end of this cross-cut a well was sunk nine feet deep, bringing the bottom on a level with the floor of the quarry. In one of these wells 100 kegs of powder were placed in bulk and wires were so arranged as to enable the two masses to be fired at the same time by electricity. The powder and the wires once in position, the wells were filled up with tamping. The manner in which the tunnel cross-cuts and wells were arranged made it easy to confine the explosive force of the powder so as to be more effective. Wires were stretched up the hill about seven hundred feet to a safe place, and a portable battery was carried to the spot. The crowd of spectators viewed the quarry and such features as were visible, and retired to the valley below, one thousand feet away, where they had a good chance to witness the explosion. Mrs Frank Pascoe touched off the powder just at 4 o'clock by merely pressing a key of the machine, and at once the whole face of the quarry was raised, and fell in an immense mass of broken rock, from the size of an egg up to that nearly of a house. Mr. Pascoe estimates that the blast brought down and loosened up between thirty and forty thousand tons of rock. The report of the explosion was not heavy,—in fact, less than is often made by a stick of giant,—but the tumbling of the rocks made the earth tremble for quite a distance. The amount of smoke which rose in an immense cloud gave some idea of the amount of powder used, and for some time obscured the view.

Sunlit Rooms.

No article of furniture should be put in a room that will not stand sunlight, for every room in a dwelling should have the windows so arranged that some time during the day a flood of sunlight will force itself into the compartments. The importance of admitting the light of the sun freely to all parts of our dwellings cannot be too highly estimated. Indeed perfect health is nearly as much dependent on pure sunlight as it is on pure air. Sunlight should never be excluded except when so bright as to be uncomfortable to the eyes. And walks should be in bright sunlights so that the eyes are protected by a veil or parasol when inconveniently intense. A sun-bath is of more importance in preserving a healthful condition of the body than is generally understood. A sun bath costs nothing, and that is a misfortune, for people are deluded with the idea that those things can only be good or useful which cost money. But remember that pure water, fresh air and sunlight homes, kept free from dampness, will secure you from many heavy bills of the doctors and give you health and vigor which no money can procure. It is now a well-established fact that the people who live much in the sun are usually stronger and more healthy than those whose occupation deprives them of sunlight. And certainly there is nothing strange in the result, since the law applies with equal force to every animate thing in nature. It is quite easy to arrange an isolated dwelling so that every room may be flooded with sunlight some time in the day, and it is possible that many town houses could be so built as to admit more light than they now receive.

Occupation as a Preventive.

Never forget that idleness is ruinous to young people, and give your boys and girls plenty to do. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," or, to change the figure, it is very easy to run a locomotive when everything is in running order, but after a collision it is quite another thing.

Take our advice. Put your boy on the right track and keep it clear. Ten chances to one he will go unhurt until he is twenty-five or thirty; and then—well, you need not break your heart because he breaks his. Accidents will happen, you know, they must come, sooner or later—but later is better. Give him something to do. As for your daughter, as soon as she leaves school her books are thrown aside, and she is expected at once to identify herself with household interests, or to become a lady of fashion, according to circumstances. Better the first than the last; but both are wrong. Give her something to do—something which involves routine. Let her keep up a slender course of study. Give her good books and papers to read. Find her occupation of some kind, or she will soon become restless and uneasy and ripe for any mischief.

CAGING A TIGER.

An Interesting and Exciting Episode at Singapore—The Neat and Effective Efforts of Malay Workmen.

The interest of the community of Singapore, India, was lately excited by the announcement that a fine tiger had been captured in a pit situated in a Chinaman's garden close to the eighth milestone on the Bukit Timah road leading to Tahore. This road, usually almost deserted, became alive with spectators proceeding either by carriage, on horseback, or on foot to and from the scene of the capture.

The pit in which the tiger was caught was circular, and measured 11 feet deep by three feet in diameter, contracting slightly at the bottom. It was dug in sandy clay, and as the sides were clean cut the tiger was not able to escape by scrambling up. The situation was on the margin of a jungle forest, and the pit, along with others, had been dug for the purpose of capturing wild pig. Those pits are covered over with thin sticks and grass or leaves, so that any unwary animals quite unaware of the unsound state of the ground. It is presumed that the tiger was either in pursuit of wild pig, or was wending his way to an adjoining farmyard, when he got into difficulties.

As soon as the owner of the pit into which the tiger had fallen was aware of his prize, he covered the mouth of the pit with strong planks, and at once looked around for a purcher, who was soon found. The sum of $125 as, (about £25) was paid for the tiger as it lay at the bottom of the pit, and it afterwards cost $.0 to have him caged and conveyed to Singapore. While negotiations were being carried on, spectators were permitted to look at the magnificent animal, for which purpose the covering of planks was partially removed. He did not at all relish these visitors, and gave marked signs of disapproval by growling and springing up. He had, however very little room for movement, but on one occasion very nearly reached the top of the pit.

For nearly six days the poor captive lay in the pit (being fed very sparingly so as to reduce his energy), while preparations were being made for caging him. At first a large square hole was dug adjacent to the pit, and it was intended to have placed a cage in this hole, having done which the partition of earth between the hole and the pit was to have been knocked away and the tiger driven into the cage. After the hole was dug this plan was, however, abandoned, as it was clumsy and dangerous, and the operation of caging the tiger was put in the hands of six Malays, who, as a race, are noted for their knowledge of woodcraft and of the habits of animals. I, with two other officers and a lady of the garrison, were the only Europeans who were fortunate enough to witness the rare sight of caging a wild tiger, and I will attempt to describe the operation in detail.

The manner in which the Malays worked was much to be admired. Every arrangement was most complete, so that no accident could in all human probability occur, and when the most difficult parts of the work was going on, strict silence was maintained among the operators, each of whom seemed to know his role with exactitude, and all worked like one machine. There seemed no fear and no hurry, while, in addition to their endeavors to bring their labors to a successful conclusion, they seemed to have whom they treated as gently as possible.

The first thing done was to rig up a strong beam at a height of about nine feet over the hole, and this was supported on well-secured uprights, to which it was firmly lashed with withes. Next there were prepared two cylindrical baskets made of green rattan. One of these baskets measured two two feet in diameter and eight feet long. The other was made just sufficiently large to be passed into the large one for the purpose of giving additional strength. One end of each basket was open while the other was closed with the exception of a hole of about three inches in diameter, the use of which will be afterward explained. Having jammed the smaller basket into the larger one, the walls of both were firmly laced together throughout wit withes, to avoid any chance of slipping. Finally two new hemp ropes, two and three-quarter inches in circumference, were prepared with running nooses. Small pieces of sticks were passed through the rope as stoppers, to prevent the loop from running before required to do so. As soon as a few long poles were cut and prepared, with a fork on some and pieces of wood lashed on others to form hooks, all was ready for the operation.

The planks covering the mouth of the pit were then slightly separated to admit of the ropes and poles being passed down. The noose of one of the ropes was lowered onto the tiger's head, which intrusion he resisted violently; but, by skill and patience, the Malays managed to get the noose over the tiger's head and round his neck. This was effected by manœuvering his paws and mouth with the poles. As soon as the noose was in position, it was drawn tight enough to prevent its being removed by the prisoner. The other rope was then passed down and secured in a similar manner. The operation of placing the two nooses round the neck occupied twenty-three minutes. The ends of the ropes were then passed through the cylindrical baskets, entering at the open end and passing out at the small hole at the other end. They were afterward passed over the overhead beam, and were held by a party of twelve coolies, ready to haul when directed to do so. The basket was then placed mouth downward over the pit, and the planks were moved just sufficiently to admit of the basket being lowered into the mouth of the pit. The exact elevation of the basket was regulated by a third rope, which was lashed to it and passed over the overhead beam and held by one man.

When all was secured and ready the word to haul was given, and the tiger was which was only large enough to receive him, and thus he was unable to struggle with effect. As soon as he was well into the basket the whole was drawn up and then laid on its side, when the mouth of the basket was at once laced up, leaving nothing but the tiger's tale protruding. When all was fast the nooses round his throat were slackened, so as to admit of his breathing freely. The nooses were, however, still left round his neck for after operations. The basket was now slung on a pole, and, with its contents, borne down the hill to the road, where a cage was in readiness to receive him. The cage was six feet long by two and a half feet broad, and was made of stout beams and planks, except at the ends, which were latticed with iron bars of an inch in diameter. Four of the bars at one end could be drawn up, and served as a door. The mouth of the basket was now firmly lashed to the end of the cage, where were the movable bars; and the ends of the ropes which were round the tiger's neck were by means of a hooked stick passed backward over the tiger and through the cage where they were held by men ready to haul. The movable bars of the cage were now drawn up, and the mouth of the basket was cut by means of a long knife, but as the tiger seemed indisposed to move out of the basket, his hind legs were levered backward with sticks, while the men in the rear hauled on the ropes.

At first the backward movement was slow, but when the tiger discovered that all was apparently clear behind, he straggled out of the basket and flew to the back of the cage, where he was checked by the bars, and retained by the ropes round his neck, which were drawn in with lightning speed by the Malays who, were evidently prepared for this movement of the tiger. The movable bars were now replaced, and the basket was cut away from the cage. All that remained was to remove the ropes from his neck, which was one by means of hooked sticks; and then the poor beast, finding himself free to move, rushed frantically about the cage, although his movements were much prescribed. Covers were then put over the bars and this soothed him. The cage having been hoisted on to a bullock cart, was removed to Singapore, where the tiger is now on view, previous to being shipped to some dealer in England or America. He is a magnificent animal, beautifully marked, and in fine condition. According to such measurements as could be made as he lay in the basket, he is nine feet long from his nose to the tip of his tail.

While waiting to see him taken out of the pit we noticed the tracks of other tigers. Some of them were large, and probably those of the tigress, prowling about near her mate, while the others were tracks of cubs. They were quite fresh, as a thunder storm the previous evening must have obliterated any old tracks.

In conclusion, I must again say that all praise is due to the Malays who carried out the operation of noosing, raising, and caging the tiger. Nothing could exceed their skill and method of working.—Correspondence London Field.

One Wing of the Chinese Army.

With these troops also bows and arrows are the favorite weapons, though a small proportion of the men carry matchlocks. Six times a month they practice archery on foot; and every string and summer, dressed in armor, they go through the same exercises on horseback. This division furnishes a guard of two men at each gate of the "forbidden city," whose duty it is to sit holding a rod bar across the gateway, and who rise only to princes of the blood. It also supplies the night patrols within the "forbidden city," who allow no one either to enter or leave the precincts unless he be the bearer of half a broken token which when fitted with the corresponding portion in possession of the officer on duty matches it exactly. The "light division," as its name indicates, is especially intended for services requiring strength and activity. The men are drilled six times a month with the scaling ladder, when they also fire three volleys with the matchlock; six times they wrestle and perform feats of horsemanship, one rider leaping on the back of another's horse, met at a gallop, while the rider of the latter similarly exchanges his seat at the same moment. While mounted they likewise fire three rounds with the matchlock, shoot three flights of arrows, and attack and defend with the sword and iron whip or flail. * * * They have, besides, six trials monthly in horse and foot archery, and twice a year, for 12 days at a time, practice at a mark with a matchlock; each marksman takes five shots each day, and is rewarded or punished according as his varied success places him in one of the three classes of proficiency." This is the kind of military exercise which particularly delights the Chinese mind. Such exhibitions of agility as somersaults and leaps are, to their thinking, inexpressibly terrifying to the enemy, and when accompanied by shouts and cries, cannot fail, they consider, to spread dismay in the opposing ranks. The "shout of battle" has, through all time, been recognized as a power in the fight; but the "buxom valor" whose "grace is only in the heels," which is displayed by Chinese soldiers, can only inspire contempt among any troops but such as are even on a lower level of inefficiency than Chinese warriers. As Corporal Trim says, "one good thrust with the bayonet is worth them all."

There are three crowns—of the Law, the Priesthood and the Kingship: but the crown of a good name is greater than them all.

Though it is not incumbent upon thee to complete the work, do not therefore cease from pursuing it. If the work is great, great will be thy reward, and thy Master is faithful in His payment.—Translated from the Talmud.

Victor Hugo, when about to make the journey in Germany which inspired his book, "The Rhine," called at the government office for his passports, when the following conversation took place with the clerk: "Your name, if you please?" "Victor Hugo." "Age?" "Thirty-three." "Profession?" The poet lifted proudly his Olympian frame and replied with majesty: "Founder of my school." "Very well. Write"—turning to a fellow-clerk—"quite out a passport for M. Victor Hugo; age, [33; schoolmaster."

Given to Lying.

What is the matter with the human What obliquity is it that induces people tell lies out of which they can get no benefit? Are the majority of people unconsciously unveracious, or are they really dupes of their senses? "I said in my all men are liars." Perhaps he might said it coolly and with scientific precision. Perhaps it is a question of physiology than of morals. The human frame is acknowledged to be a wonderful piece of mechanism. The Psalmist admired it, but puzzled him. If he had been a scientist would have been able to give physiological reasons for the opinion that there is not one perfect man—no, not one. Scarcely a perfect woman. It is known that two people do not see the same thing alike, and consequently they describe it differently. They do not hear the same statement alike, and they always repeat it with variations. Of witnesses the eye is the least trustworthy. It appears to be the most subject to delusions. There is a reason for this. No two persons have eyes alike. The two eyes in one head are seldom alike; if they match in color they are different in form, different in focus. Not one eye in ten millions is in a normal perfect condition. The focus is either behind the retina or in front of it, and the eye is either near-sighted or far-sighted. What can be expected of such an imperfect organ in the way of correct observation? It appears to be still worse with the ear. It is at best a crooked organ, and nearly everything that passes through it gets a twist. And these two defective machines are allied with probably the most deceitful little member that ever was—the tongue. The effort of the tongue to put into words and speech the so called impressions obtained through the complicated mechanism of the eye and the ear is a ludicrous failure. Any one who is familiar with a court of justice or neighborhood talk knows that. And owing to the sympathy of one part of the body with another, the thumb and the fore and middle fingers (which hold the pen) become infected. The substitution of the inflexible stylographic pen for the flowing quill steel it was thought would tend to remedy this defect. But this obstacle in the way of writing does not check the tendency to prevaricate any more than stuttering does in the case of the tongue; and it is just as difficult for a stammerer to speak the truth as for a glib-tongued person. The consequence of this infection of the pen-fingers is that what is not strictly true now and then creeps into print. People are beginning to find out this physical defect, and many persons now will not believe what they read in a newspaper any more than if it were told them by an intimate friend. But they read it and repeat it; and owing to the eye defects before spoken of, they scarcely ever repeat it as it is printed. So we all become involved in the congeries of misrepresentation.—Charles Dudley Warner, in Harper's Magazine for July.

Little Florence C. was besieging her father to take her to visit her grandmother, who lived some miles distant. To get rid of her importuning he said: "It costs $10 every time we go to see grandma, Florence, and $10 don't grow on every bush." "Neither do $10 grandmas grow on every bush," answered the little girl promptly, and her logic was convincing. They went.

TOSSED ON AN ANGRY SEA.

... Crazed by Suffering While Adrift in a Rowboat.

Daniel Stevens, a broad shouldered, ... limbed sailor, with his face burned ... exposure to the sun in an open boat ... until the skin has cracked open, is lying ... the Long Island Hospital, Brooklyn. He ... formerly the mate of the brigantine G. ... Sherwood, Capt. R. D. Taylor, of St. ... N. B., and is now the sole survivor of ...

The Sherwood took in 600 tons of coal at ... Philadelphia for Halifax last week, and then ... dropped down the river. She put to sea on ... Sunday afternoon. She had on board a ... crew of nine and the captain's wife. Among ... the crew were Daniel Taylor, the captain's ... brother, and Ernest Robinson, his nephew, ... 17 years old. The Taylors all belong ... to Dorchester, N. B. Mr. Stephens knew ... other members of the crew, but was un... able last night to recall their names.

On Friday night the Sherwood was about ... miles east of the Delaware Breakwater. ... night came on a gale sprang up. Capt. ... Taylor had the lighter sails taken in, and ... the mainsail close reefed. Before 2 o'clock ... in the morning the heaviest sea was running ... the mate had ever seen. Believing that ... the vessel ought to be hove to, he called the ... captain, who had gone below. Capt. Tay... lor at once called all hands to shorten sail. ... Before the order could be obeyed a wave ... struck the brig on the port beam just as a ... squall struck her aloft. She went over to ... leeward with her yard arms under water ... in an instant, and failed to right herself

THE CARGO OF COAL HAD SHIFTED,

TALKING TO HIMSELF ALL THE TIME.

"As the sun went down and we were more ... comfortable, though the wind blew about as ... hard as ever. I held on to the spar the ... best I could, and Mike held on by the oars ... we always had lashed forward in the boats. ... When morning came, and then Mike began to ... cut the oars adrift. He wouldn't listen to ... me then, but I caught two of the oars and ... lashed them to the spar. They helped to ... keep the boat on a level keel. But Mike ... had lost his hold after the oars were gone, ... and then I was all alone.

"As the sun grew hot I thought I saw a ... steamship come up alongside. The men ... on deck hailed me, and when I tried to get ... them to take me off they only laughed at ... me. Then a revenue cutter seemed to ap... proach, and then a big black ship appeared ... alongside of her. The men on them waved ... their arms and shouted at me. The noise ... seemed to split my head. Then night seem... ed to come again, and I could feel the cool ... air on my face. I guess I was a little queer, ... for no men could do what those men seemed to. By and by it got light again and the ... sun was as hot as ever, and a big white ... barkentine was bearing down on me. That ... ed her just as I had the rest, and she sailed ... right by as they had. Pretty soon she came ... back again. I knew I was wild, but I could-... n't help seeing her nor could I help shout... ing to her.

"This time a man jumped on the rail, and ... seemed to throw a line at me, but he jerked ... it back so that it fell a long way short of ... me, and then the men all shouted and waved ... their hands. I couldn't understand a word ... they said, and the vessel sailed on. I was ... wondering when it would all end when that ... same barkentine hove in sight again. I ... thought she'd run me down this time, but ... another man jumped on the rail with a heav... ing line. It seemed very strange to me even ... when

I FELT THE LINE DROP ON MY ARM.

I made it fast around under my arms, and ... that is the last I remembered about being in ... the water."

The Spanish barkentine Rafael Pomas, Capt. Pina, arrived here yesterday, 13 days from Havana. On last Sunday afternoon, while First Mate Juan Guetglas had charge of the deck, he saw a man adrift in a boat. He notified the Captain and ordered the wheel up. In their anxiety to avoid running the sailor down, the vessel was kept away so far that they could not reach him. As they passed the boat the man put out his arms in a most pitiful way, but no help could be rendered that time. The sailors worked with a will when putting the vessel about and she was soon heading for the man again. This time they ran within reach, and a sailor leaped on the rail and threw the line. A wave struck the vessel and the line fell short and the vessel again drifted out of reach. The sailor seemed to loose heart entirely then and sank down in his boat and a wave rolled over him. Then he got up again and stood staring straight ahead apparently not seeing the vessel.

It was 2½ hours before the vessel was brought near enough to reach the man. When the mate dropped a line across his shoulder he secured it around his waist, and was drawn on board. He was then insensible. His clothes were torn to shreds, and his face and hands were in a bad condition. The sailors carried him forward, stripped him, rubbed him with rum, and gave him a little with water. After a time he began to revive. Then a chicken was killed and broth made for him.

"No one could have taken better care of me than Capt. Pina," said Mr. Stephens. "He put me in a comfortable bunk in the cabin, and nursed me like a child. When I was picked up I wasn't able to stand, and I haven't been out of my bunk since, till to day, when I was able to walk a little."

Capt. Taylor was about 37 years old. He had been married less than two years. He lost his first child last winter, and his wife then went to sea with him. She liked the ocean very much, having sailed with him two or three voyages after they were first married. Capt. Taylor was a cousin of Capt. D. E. Taylor of the firm of P. I. Nevius & Son, ship brokers, 11 South street. —N. Y. Sun.

Religious Equality in England.

The time has now long gone by since those who approach the question of the Establishment must first turn or capture the great fortresses that have been at sundry times and in divers places diligently reared in defense of a National Church by a long array of potent divines. From the noble gravity of Hooker, in the sixteenth century, and the shrewd reason of Warburton and Paley in the eighteenth, down to the pratical wisdom of Chalmers, the vehemence of Arnold, the eager tenacity of Stanley in our own immediate day and generation, all the resources of ecclesiastical eloquence and logic have gone to build up and to fortify a theory which may still impress the student of abstract polity, but which has a steadily and rapid lessening relation to real affairs. Nor is it any more needful that the assailant of the establishment should begin with the imposing pleas of some of the most renowned of lay statesmen, from Burke to Mr. Gladstone, in favor of the solemn consecration of the Commonwealth by binding it to a great ecclesiastical corporation, "exalting its mitred front in courts and parliaments," and giving to the civil magistrate the guardianship of the settled institution of religion. However gracious the ideal, it is now seen to be practically unattained and forever unattainable. As we trace back the course of events, the most reluctant eye sees them all tending uniformly and with growing momentum to the secularization of the State and the emancipation of the Church. Social forces, political forces, intellectual forces, spiritual forces, all united in one undeviating and indeflectible direction. Attachment to the Church of England as a religious society is probably deeper in the heart and imaginations of men than it has ever been. But the march of legislation for the last half-century has faithfully registered the growth of the conviction that the installation of the Episcopal Church in the seat of privilege is no condition of its moral or religious efficacy, while it is a political injustice, a social mischief, and a hindrance to the full sense of equal citizenship in a united community.

Mosquitoes Under the Microscope.

We have long held the opinion that the mosquito is an unmitigated scoundrel, who could give our own lively flea six stone and a beating over a long course, but we are now convinced. A gentleman has examined Mr. Mosquito under a microscope, and his description is, to say the least, startling. It appears that in the "bill" of the little beast alone there are no fewer than five distinct surgical instruments. These are described as a lance, two meat saws, a suction pump and a small Corliss steam engine. It appears that when a "skeeter" settles down to his work upon a nice tender portion of the human frame the lance is first pushed into the flesh, then the two saws, placed back to back, begin to work up and down to enlarge the hole, then the pump is inserted, and the victim's blood is syphoned up to the reservoirs carried behind, and finally, to complete the cruelty of the performance, the wretch drops a quantity of poison into the wound to keep it irritated. Then the diminutive fiend takes a fly round just to digest your gore, and makes tracks for a fresh victim, or if the first one has been of usually good quality he returns to the same happy hunting ground. The mosquito's marvellous energy, combined with his portable operating chest, makes him at once a terror and a pest. Our English skin grazers are doves in comparison with them.

North American Life Assurance Company ...

Among the usual indications and best evidences of the financial status of a country is included the condition of its life companies. In this respect Canada is at present specially favored. The companies in that country have of late made great progress, and the North American Life is among the most progressive companies. Its development, considering the great competition existing in the life business, has been something marvellous, and at its present progress it bids fair in a very few years to take a leading position in the issue of new business in Canada. There is a cause for everything, and there is no doubt in this case the true reason of the North American Life meeting with such high appreciation from the insuring public is owing to its very marked endeavor to place within the reach of all those desiring the great benefit of life insurance all the most popular plans attainable, so that when a person requires an investment or maximum insurance for minimum outlay he can secure it with the North American Life Assurance Society.

No doubt the success of this company is largely due to its management being in the hands of an accomplished underwriter, Wm. McCabe, Fellow of the Institute of Actuaries of Great Britain, a gentleman who has the reputation of being thoroughly acquainted with all the mysteries and science of life insurance. Among its directors are to be found the names of some of the leading citizens of Canada, and at its head as president stands the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie, M. P., ex Prime Minister of Canada, a gentleman whose name in that country is a household word for honesty and fair dealing. New York Insurance Spectator, May 15th, 1884.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinay success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

It is Not Disputed

That NERVILINE, the new pain remedy, is a good article. Some indeed claim that the old-fashioned preparations are just as good, but any sufferer can satisfy himself by expending ten cents on a sample bottle of Polson's Nerviline, that nothing sold can equal it for internal, local or external pains. Always speedy in effect, prompt and certain in every cure. H. S. Webber, Orangeville, writes: "My customers speak very highly of Nerviline as a remedy for toothache or neuralgia." All druggists and country dealers sell Nerviline. Try it to-day.

SAW MILL AND TIMBER LAND FOR SALE OR TO LET

In the Township of Artemesia, County of Grey, 4 miles from Flesherton Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The mill is situated at Little Falls, in a block of about 400 acres timber and, with other timber land surrounding. The building is substantially built on stone foundation. The machinery is all good and driven with great power by a 23 inch Leffell wheel, under 36 ft. head of water. There are one large circular saw for cutting logs, 2 small circulars for sawing lath and broom handles, 1 guage lathe for turning broom handles, etc., 1 shingle machine with jointer and packer complete. The water power is excellent, the stream being very regular. There are several other good mill sites on the proyerty. The land in valley is considered the best in the country. The place would make an excellent stock farm when the timber is taken off.

This offers a good opportunity for a practical, energetic man to go into this kind of business, as the place will be sold or let on liberal terms.

The bush is so convenient to the mill logs can be trucked in summer time. Immediate possession given.

THE SECRET OUT.

The secret of beauty has been at last revealed. Without good health, pure blood and a fair clear skin none can possess good looks. What is more repulsive than pimples, blotches and a sallow or pasty complexion? Burdock Blood Bitters reveal the fact that all can gain pure blood and freedom from the repulsive diseases of the skin that result from impurities.

IMPORTANT CHANGES.

There are two periods in the life of every female when the system undergoes great changes. First the change from childhood to womanhood; next, that of womanhood to old age. These are the critical changes of life, and the system should be nourished and regulated by that matchless tonic, Burdock Blood Bitters. It is invaluable in all diseases peculiar to females.

Bears.

Bears are becoming very plentifull according to reports, and serious damage is being done in various parts especially to sheep, would it not be well for the various township councils to offer a reward similer to what is given for the destruction of wolves. We believe the public would highly appreciate such action on the part of their various councillors, and it would certainly incite those who are troubled with bruin to a greater effort in capturing, and thus exterminating this class of wild beast.

A Big Fire.

PARRY SOUND, June 20.—About one o'clock yesterday morning a fire broke out in the Midland and North Shore Lumber company's steam saw mill at Parry harbor, and before it could be stopped the mill, boarding-house, machine shop, office, a portion of the tramway and a large amount of other valuable property was destroyed. The mill was one of the best on the Georgian bay, having all the latest improved machinery and capacity of cutting from 80,000 to 100,000 feet per day. The loss is about $100,000; insured for about $40,000.

"Sir:—I perused your oration with much deliberation and a little consternation, at the great infatuation of your weak imagination, to show such veneration on so slight a foundation. I suppose your animation was the fruit of recreation, or had sprung from ostentation to display your education by an odd enumeration or rather multiplication of words of the same termination though of great variation, in each respective signification. Now, without disputation, your laborious application to so tedious an occupation deserves commendation: and thinking imitation sufficient gratification, I am without hesitation Yours, MARY MODERATION."

FRAUDULENT TRANSACTIONS.

There are many frauds perpetrated in medicine, and many advertised remedies worse than useless. Not so with Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It remains as ever the best internal and external medicine for all pain, soreness and injuries with which human flesh is afflicted.

RESPECT OLD AGE.

An old favorite is the remedy known as Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry. Thirty years releable for choler morbus diarrhœa and summer complaints.

WHAT IN A NAME?

Scrofula is so called from the Latin scrofa, a pig, from the supposition that the disease came from eating swine's flesh. It is often inherited from parents, and leades to abscesses, ulcerous sores, debility, king's evil and consumption. The case of the Rev. Wm. Stout, of Wiarton, who suffered 23 years from scrofulous abscesses, is one of the most remarkable on record. Burdock Blood Bitters cured him after the best medical skil had failed.

FATAL ACCIDENT IN GLENELG.—On Saturday last Mrs. John Laughlan, of the 3rd con. of Glenelg, E. G. R., went to get some potatoes out of a pit, for dinner, and while doing so the earth caved in and a little son only five years old who saw the accident went and told his father who was working in a distant part of the farm. Mr. Laughlan at once hurried to the pit, but when he got his wife from under the earth she was quiet dead. The deceased was a daughter of Mr. Kenneth McKenzie, of Glenelg, and leaves a husband and several small Children to mourn her loss. The funeral took place on Monday last and was largely attended. Much sympathy is felt for the family in their sudden bereavement.—Grey Review.

ANOTHER SEMI-CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.—Capt. Vacey C. Hill and his wife of Presque Isle, a village a few miles along the shore from Owen Sound, celebrated their golden wedding on Friday, 13th inst. They were married in Toronto on June 10th, 1834. The village had a procession in their honour and presented them with an address. The Captain, who is now seventy years of age, was born in the city of Cork in 1814. His father was a captain in the 32nd Regiment of Foot. Mrs. Hill is the daughter of the late Capt. Odlum, of the Royal African Corps, and was born in Senegal, Africa, in September, 1816.

CHURCH DEDICATION.

The dedication services of the New Presbyterian Church here on Sabbath last were very largely attended the house being filled at each service to over flowing. Morning and evening large numbers had to return home could not get within the building. Three very earnest, effecting sermons were preached by the Rev. John Smith of Toronto, morning and evening, and Rev. Mr. McDowell of this village in the afternoon. The spirit of true devotion was apparent in all the services and the feeling of the heart was expressed by the dropping of the tear from many an eye. Liberal donations were given at each service, the collections for the day amounting to $144.

DOMINION DAY.

A large crowd of people were present in the village on Dominion Day, the field sports attracted large numbers, also a good number attended the Temperance Pic-Nic held in Flesher's Park. Various games and amusements were entered into. Two thrilling and enthusiastic Temperance addresses were delivered by the Rev. John Smith of Toronto, and Mr. Richard Campbell of Collingwood, after which "God Save the Queen" was sung and three rousing cheers for the Scott Act was given.

The tea meeting and lecture given in the Presbyterian Church on the evening of Dominion Day, was in every respect a success. Rev. Mr. Smith's Popular lecture "Sins of the Pew" is full of wit & humor yet pointed and practical. Short addresses were also given by the Rev. Mr. McDowell and Mr. McGregor and Dr. Sproule. Proceeds for the tea $97, making a total cash receipt from Sunday collection and tea meeting $242.

A Financial Statement of the Church was read showing that 1200 dollars was unprovided for, a subscription list was opened up and only about $100 is now required to place the church free from debt.

General Sessions and County Court.

(From the Owen Sound Times.)

The General Session and County Court for this County commenced on Tuesday. His Honor Judge Macpherson, presiding. The following gentlemen comprised the Grand Jury:—

John Stronach, Foreman; Quinton Campbell, Alfred Ward, Hugh Knott, Jas. Hastie, Wm. Hunter, John Ferguson, Jno. Baines, James Calvert, Wm. McLarty, Jas. McInnis, John Wheeler, James Lindsay, Thos Julian, Geo. Riddell, David Ammerman, John Douglass, Andrew Welfley, C. Thecksston.

The following business was disposed of:—

MERRIT VS. ASHTON.—Action on account. Verdict for plaintiff by consent, $48 97. D. A. Creasor for plaintiff. John Creasor, Q. C., for defendant,

WEDNESDAY.

The Grand Jury having brought in a true bill against Charles Coulson and Venwyck for assaulting a peace officer, they pleaded guilty to common assault, and were fined $50 and $10 respectively. A Frost for the Crown. Jas. Masson for defendant.

CHRISTOE VS. SINCLAIR et al.—Action on account. Judgment for plaintiff, $126.50. A. Frost for plaintiff. J. Masson for defendants.

John M. Davis, accused for obtaining property by false pretences, was brought into Court and discharged, there being no evidence against him.

In the cases of Martha Brown for larceny of jewellery, and Wm. Drifill for assault, the Grand Jury found no bills.

R. H. Langdale, of Normanby, and Dennis Sullivan, of Owen Sound, were appointed constables.

FLEMMING VS. COCHRANE.—The defendant had purchased an organ from plaintiff, giving him a horse in payment. He afterwards claimed that the organ was not as represented, and took away the horse, which the present action was to recover. Judgment for plaintiff for property and $5 damages. A. Frost for plaintiff. John Creasor, Q. C., for defendant.

MCEACHNIE VS. MILLNER.—This was an action of trespass for an alleged cutting of timber by defendant on land claimed by plaintiff. Judgment for defendant with costs. J. Masson for plaintiff. John Creasor, Q. C., for defendant.

SINCLAIR VS. STEPHENS.—This was a dispute about a building contract. After hearing part of the evidence, the parties consented to a verdict for plaintiff of $75 and costs. S. Platt for plaintiff. John Creasor, Q. C., for defendant.

EDITORS PASS FREE.

An exchange sets forth the benefits of the editorial profession as follows: One of the beauties of an editor's life is his dead-beating it. No one who never feasted on the sweets of that bliss can begin to talk in the glory of its happiness. He does $100 worth of advertising for a railroad, gets a "pass," rides $25 worth, and then is looked upon as a dead-head or a half-blown dead-beat. He "puffs" a concert troupe ten dollars' worth, and gets $1 in complimentaries and is thus passed "free." If the hall is crowded, he is begrudged the room he occupies, for if his complimentaries were paying tickets the troupe would be so much in pocket. He blows and puffs a church festival free to any desired extent and does the poster printing at half rates, and rarely gets a "thank you" for it. It goes as part of his duty as an editor. He does more work gratuitiously for the town and community than all the rest of the population put together, and gets cursed for it all, while the man who donates a few dollars to a First of July celebration, brass band or church, is gratefully remembered. Oh, it is a sweet thing to be an editor. He passes "free," you know.

A Girl Drowned at Thornbury.

THORNBURY, July 2.—A fatal drowning accident occurred here yesterday by which a girl named Alexander, of this place, lost her life. Three young girls were amusing themselves on a small raft at the mouth of Indian river, when a strong wind blew them into the lake, the raft parted, and Miss Alexander was thrown into the water and drowned. The others were nobly rescued from their perilous condition by H. Gage. The body was recovered by J. Henderson.

GREAT FATALITY
The ravages of Cholera Infantum and Summer Complaints among children is truly alarming. The most reliable cure is Dr. Fowler's Wild Strawberry. Every bottle guaranteed to give satisfaction.

His Uncle's Heir.

CHAPTER I.

"And you will be gone three days, Frank?"

Frank de Walden smiled at the pathetic little sigh that finished the sentence, and May Verner laughed aloud.

"You foolish child," she said, gathering up her working materials and preparing to leave the lovers alone, "do not you know that it will be an unmitigated blessing to have Frank safely disposed of for the next few all important days? Even if he were not in duty bound to obey Sir George's summons, I should still say, Go."

"Abdicate in favor of the milliners, in fact," Frank observed, watching the brisk movements of his future sister-in-law with lazy content. He was very fond of May; but just now a tete-a-tete with Essie seemed a thing most desirable in his eyes.

"Exactly; and unless you wish Mrs. Frank deWalden's trousseau to be lamentably incomplete, you will rather prolong than shorten your visit," May said, and disappeared with a laughing nod.

"Is May right, Essie?" Frank asked, turning to his little sweetheart. "Do I keep you from the serious duties of life? No"—he stopped and kissed the pretty upturned face—"your first duty is—to me."

"And yours to Sir George," Essie answered, with a pout; but the pout was all playful, though there was a suggestion of tears in the eyes that were as blue as April skies, though fringed with jet-black lashes.

They were a handsome couple, and formed a pretty picture as they sat on the flower-filled terrace of the picturesque river side house—he tall, strong, grey-eyed, and fair-haired, she small and slender, with fine jet-black hair, and pretty, pale skin, that seemed to give, by force of contrast, an intensity and depth of color to the innocent blue eyes. Frank looked meditatively at the river glistening like molten gold in the sunset glow, and bright with pleasure-boats of every kind, before he answered her last, pettish remark. Then he said with a little laugh,

"Well, I suppose I do owe him some duty, Essie, though hitherto he has not given me much opportunity of paying my debts. I never was so surprised in my life as when I received his note."

"I thought he telegraphed?"

"So he did, on his arrival in England, and wrote by the following post. Let me see—I must have his letter. Ah, here it is! Rather a mysterious epistle too for such a steady-going old fellow as my respected uncle."

And Frank placed the paper he extracted from his pocket-book in the girl's hands. She turned it over with a puzzled look, then began to study its contents.

"Read it aloud, Essie," the young man broke in; and while he lounged lazily upon the balustrade and looked out over the smooth-shaven green lawn to the glittering water beyond, the clear girlish voice read out the following letter:—

"My dear Nephew,—When you wrote to me three weeks ago, announcing your engagement to Miss Esther Verner, you thought I suppose, that you were performing a conventional civility to your father's brother, and never guessed how deep an interest the news would have for him. Of course it was news to be expected. A good-looking young fellow like you, with many advantages, natural and acquired, was surely looked upon as a prize in the matrimonial market."

"Do you take that sentence to heart, Miss Essie?" Frank put in gravely; but Essie went on demurely.

"And I was at one time afraid that, relying too surely upon your expectations, you have made an imprudent choice of a wife. This however does not seem to be the case. I take your word for Miss Verner's loveable and amiable qualities, the photograph answers for her grace and beauty; and, as the world calls her father a rich man, I suppose she adds to her other attractions the solid and lasting charm of wealth."

Essie Verner looked up from the paper with a sudden flush, and found that angry glow reflected in her lover's face.

"He is dreadfully practical," Frank said, with a rather nervous smile; "but parents and guardians will be like this to the end of the world."

"I suppose so," Essie agreed, shaking her dark head dolefully. "Perhaps papa would have refused me to you if you had not been Sir George de Walden's heir."

"I think the 'perhaps' is more than probable," Frank answered drily. "Indeed, I hardly think that I should have found the courage to ask him to give his beautiful daughter to a briefless barrister."

"Then you would have done the beautiful daughter a cruel wrong," the girl said, in a shy half-whisper, and with a quick and eloquent upward glance that, as a matter of course, brought her lover to her side, and, for a while at least, interrupted the reading of the letter.

"Now do let me finish, Frank," she said at last. "Papa will be home immediately, and then you must talk to him. I do so want to know what more your uncle has to say. I have lost my place. Ah, here it is!"

"By the time this reaches you, I shall be in England—at the Court; and I request, as a particular favor, that you will join me there at once, as there are some business-matters that must be settled between us without further delay. Remember me to Miss Verner, whose acquaintance I shall hope soon to make, and believe me now as heretofore,

"Your affectionate uncle,

"GEORGE DE WALDEN."

"What a strange letter!" Essie said handing it back. "But Sir George is rather a strange man, is he not?"

"Well, yes, I suppose so; but I cannot say I remember him very clearly. He has led a wandering life, you know, and only settled down to his hermitage near Naples within the last three years. I have since then thought several times of running over to see him; but——"

"But what?" Essie echoed curiously, as her lover paused, with a slight shrug of the shoulders and a meditative twist of his moustache." Would he not have been glad to see you?"

"Well, he never evinced any eagerness on the point. In fact, this is the first invitation he ever sent me."

"What a shocking old creature! And you are his only relative—his own brother's child! If he does not care for you, what can he care for?"

"Rather a difficult question to answer," Frank said, smiling at the girl's indignant face. "Coins, brasses, antiquities of every [illegible] perhaps, for he is a Doctor Schliemann in a small way; but, on the whole, it would be easier to tell you what he hates."

"T[illegible]"

"Yo[illegible]," Frank answered [illegible]ily. He is [illegible] of the m[illegible] described a[illegible] description, and therefore I am [illegible] that he would [illegible] civility of [illegible]"

"[illegible] new [illegible] moment. Perhaps he has changed his views. At any rate I shall try to convert him," Essie cried, with a little confident nod.

And, looking at the pretty creature in her soft dress of creamy pink, with coral knots and buttons that set off the clear pallor of the skin; the dusky locks and bright blue eyes, Frank thought proudly and fondly that his dainty love would find the subjugation of any man, even a gruff old woman-hater like his uncle, an easy task. But he could not discuss the matter further, for just then Mr. Verner and his elder daughter came out upon the terrace, and the conversation naturally took a more general character.

Mr. Verner was a big, florid, fair man, stamped, as it were, with a sort of hall-mark of success. Somehow it was impossible to be in his presence an hour without feeling that he was very rich, and had accumulated all his money by his own unaided exertions, though why that conviction should be borne in upon one it was not quite so easy to say. There was nothing of pompous self-assertion in his manner, nothing of boasting in his quietly-correct speech; but, in some way, the impression was given, and it was correct.

If Constantine Verner had not absolutely entered London with the traditional half-crown of the prospective millionaire as his sole possession, he had at least spent several years of sordid poverty within it before fortune vouchsafed him the faintest and most wintry smile; but he had from the first a calmly confident belief in himself and his own future; and, when the occasion for which he had long waited, came, he seized it at once. A small successful speculation was followed by a greater; "Verner's luck" became proverbial upon 'Change, and the unknown, struggling man developed into a social celebrity. Those struggling days lay very far back in his life now; May and Essie knew nothing of them. He had not married until the clouds began to break; their lives had been wholly spent in the sunshine of prosperity, and their only grief as yet had been their mother's death, which had occurred about three years back.

People rather wondered that Mr. Verner who had no heir to carry on his name and succeed to his great possessions, did not marry again; but he announced frankly that he was content with his girls, and meant to devote the remainder of his life to them.

"If Heaven had sent me a son, well and good," he would say in his more expansive moments. "I should like to think that I had left a Constantine Verner behind me; but Heaven has not so pleased, and I have received too many good gifts to grumble because one more is denied me. Esther and May are good and pretty girls, not likely to disappoint my just and reasonable hopes; and, if they only marry to please me, I shall be quite satisfied to share my fortune between them"—an announcement that naturally brought a crowd of courtiers and aspirants, eligible and the reverse, about the pretty co-heiresses' heels.

Fortunately for them, however—for they had as yet no conception of the strength of their father's will and the terrible consequences of incurring his displeasure—they had both chosen to please him, and with their future, as his roseatte fancy planned it, he was blandly and smilingly content.

"May, of whom I expected less, has done me the greater credit," he would say, leaning back in his big chair, and joining his finger-tips lightly, as he surveyed the situation serenely with his mind's eye. "Lord Croxford is of course unobjectionable in every way; moreover, she really cares for him, which is remarkable in such a match. Now Essie—ah, my little Essie might have done better, so much admired as she was too! But I have not the heart to cross that child's whim. Moreover, De Walden is a fine young fellow, of excellent family and prospects; there is nothing against him but his present lack of means, and that my daughter need not mind. Sir George cannot live for ever, and then little Essie will be Lady de Walden of De Walden Court. Well, well, the 'whirligig of time' plays us strange pranks! What would my good, plodding old father have said had any one told him that his grandchildren would be, the one a peeress, the other a baronet's wife?"

Having thus philosophically reconciled himself to the match, Mr. Verner received his future son-in-law not only graciously, but with distinguished consideration, and made no objection to the early marriage for which Frank pleaded, provided that Sir George de Walden, on his side, had nothing to say against it.

"For you will of course ask your uncle's consent; he may have other views for you," Mr. Verner said, with a stateliness at which Frank inwardly and irreverently laughed, though he answered with perfect gravity that he had already written on the subject, but was assured of his uncle's consent.

"So Sir George has answered your letter in person?" Mr. Verner said, when the girls had left the table, and the two men sat alone over their wine, the elder peeling a peach with much deliberation, the younger casting longing glances out at the terrace, where Essie and May sat chatting in the soft dusk.

"In person and on paper too, sir: he wishes me to run down to the Court."

"But he makes no objection to the marriage?"

"On the contrary, he expresses the warmest approval, admires Essie's photograph, and, in short, writes very pleasantly indeed," concluded Frank, thinking that, on the whole, it was better to summarize the letter than read it just at present; and Mr. Verner received the summary with a well-pleased smile.

"Then, as he comes to bless and not to ban, we must take his promptitude as a great compliment. Of course you go to him at once?"

"Of course. It will be rather queer to see the old place alive again. It looked like the palace of the Sleeping Beauty the last time I was down there."

"De Walden Court is very old, I believe?" Mr. Verner asked, with an anticipative pride in the historic grandeur of his Essie's future home; but Frank answered carelessly—

"Not very—Elizabethan only; but it is a picturesque old place, and I cannot think what made my uncle neglect it so long."

"Well, the neglect is over for a time at least," said the other, pushing back his chair, and rising in pity for the lover's manifest impatience. "You will convey [illegible] to Sir George, Frank, and, [illegible], it will be necessary [illegible] more [illegible] him of a [illegible]"

Frank nodded assentingly; [illegible] doubtful whether he quite knew [illegible] proposition he agreed, for the [illegible] was [illegible] in the moonlight bending eagerly over Essie's chair.

"At last!" the girl cried, lifting her soft reproachful eyes to his. "Oh, Frank how long you have been!"

"And I have grudged every moment," he answered eagerly; "but we were talking business, sweetheart, and now the task is over and my reward has come."

"Yes, but this time to-morrow——" the girl said, with a little involuntary shiver. "Do you know, I have a superstitious dread of this visit, Frank."

Frank only laughed, and kissed the pretty, jewelled fingers that tightened on his then; but afterwards he recalled the words with a strange, superstitious thrill; and wondered whence that shadowy warning came.

CHAPTER II.

"Mr. De Walden, sir?"

The man touched his hat, and came across the platform with an interrogative look, as, hot and dusty with his long journey, Frank alighted at the quaint little road-side station which was the nearest point to De Walden Court. There were few passengers and those few were villagers, so the servant's discriminatory powers were not severely taxed in picking out the stranger guest.

"Yes, I am Mr. De Walden. I hope Sir George is well."

"Quite well, sir, but a little knocked up by the late journey. He has sent the dog-cart, sir, as he could not come himself."

Frank nodded, and as he gathered up the reins, found himself vaguely wondering what it was that struck him as strange in the speaker's tone and look. The man was a perfectly well-bred English servant, with the civilly reserved speech and automatic movements peculiar to his class; but either Frank imagined it, or the dull wide eyes rested on his face with a momentary glance of curiosity and compassion.

"Pshaw! I am getting as nervously fanciful as my little Essie!" the young man thought with a smile at his own folly as the cart bowled briskly along through the green luxuriant country that lay between the station and the Court. "I could never lecture her with any show of propriety again if she only knew that I indulged in whims and phantasies too."

It was nearly six when they drew up before the old gray-stone house clothed from basement to turret with ivy, and bathed in a rosy sunset glow that made the small pointed windows glitter with a jewel-like lustre from their dark setting. On the lowest of the three terraces that ran along the wide front of the house two tall peacocks spread out the iridescent splendor of their tails, erected their graceful heads and starcrowned crests, and screamed a discordant welcome.

"'The raven himself is hoarse that croaks the fatal entrance of Duncan under my battlements,'" Frank murmured sotto voce, and then he scolded himself for the mal a propos quotation that had come unbidden to his lips, and ran lightly up the steps to join Sir George, who stood on the upper terrace.

"Welcome to the Court, Frank," said the elder man. "And welcome home, sir," cried the younger, in a breath; and then they looked into each other's faces, and again that curious sensation of being studied and compassioned came over Frank de Walden's mind.

"What a conceited fool I am to-day!" he decided almost angrily. "Of course, after such an absence, he studies me a little bit. Am not I studying him? Very well, he looks too, on the whole, though he seems a little more nervous and shaky than I thought him in the old days; perhaps his years begin to tell."

"You look well and happy, Frank," Sir George said, with something like a sigh, as he turned from the contemplation of his nephew's stalwart figure and bright handsome face, and led the way into the great cool library that lay at the back of the house and looked upon the placid water of the lake.

Frank laughed, throwing his hat down upon the table and settling himself lightly and easily on the arm of a big chair.

"I was just thinking the same of you, sir. You look—I don't know exactly how to put it—brighter and younger than when I saw you last, though that was five years ago."

Frank spoke the simple truth as it presented itself to his mind. Had he been dealing in subtle flattery, he must have been pleased with the gratified flush of the handsome old face, the pleased sparkle of the still bright eyes, though Sir George only said, deprecatingly—

"Tush, my dear boy! I am as well as a man of my age can expect to be, that is all; but, to return to you and your prospects."

Frank opened his eyes at this. His own prospects naturally engrossed a large share of his thoughts, and he was anxious enough to discuss them; but considering that he had but just set foot in the house, that he was thirsty and travel-stained, and even a little confused, his uncle's haste struck him as unseemly and absurd.

"Oh, my prospects are bright enough!" he answered carelessly. "At this moment I have but one wish in the world."

"And that is——"

"To wash off all this dust, and get something to drink."

Sir George turned away with a smothered exclamation of disgust.

"You will find wine and spirits and so on on the side-board," he said impatiently; "and for the rest, I think your 'tub' must wait a little while; there is something I must say to you at once."

Frank only wondered what reason could excuse this frantic haste, but wisely confined all expression of wonder to a brief uplifting of his eyebrows, and listened respectfully while he slaked his thirst.

"Honestly, you are perfectly happy and contented with your lot?"

"Perfectly," the young man answered, lifting the bright face that was in itself the fullest confirmation of his words.

"Miss Verner is a good unselfish girl, who loves you for yourself alone?"

"I am sure of it, though that is rather a strange question, sir," Frank answered, with a sudden flush.

"I know it; but the necessity for putting such questions [illegible] all my plans [illegible] brought me home."

[illegible]

"[illegible] think so, though he might reasonably have expected something better for Essie, who was the loveliest debutante of her season. Her photograph really gives you no idea of her beauty. She is——"

But Sir George waved the subject of Essie and her charms impatiently away, and pursued that which interested him.

"He knows exactly how things stand with you?"

"Of course; he made himself acquainted with my position[illegible]"

"Your position [illegible] hundred a year of independent income? Your prospects at the bar?" Sir George asked, eyeing the [illegible] face [illegible].

For the first time Frank hesitated over his answer, and felt uncomfortable and perplexed. As a matter of course, the next heir of a recluse bachelor uncle sixty years old looks on himself as sure of the succession, and gives that comfortable security a prominent place among the prospects of which he speaks; and Frank de Walden, being only human, had naturally done as other men would do in his place. But it was one thing to think this and tacitly allow it to be thought, and quite another to look in the living man's face, and say with brutal frankness—"No, my prospects of succeeding you."

"Can you not answer?" the elder man cried, cutting his uncomfortable meditations short; and Frank answered with an uneasy smile—

"It is an awkward question."

"Let me make it easier then; and for Heaven's sake answer me frankly. No; that I am sure you will do. Answer me promptly—that is all I ask. Did Mr. Verner give his daughter to you, the young struggling barrister, with nothing but a shadowy family interest and his own bright wits to help [illegible] int the fight, or—to the future Sir Francis, the heir of De Walden Court?"

The blood rushed hotly over Frank de Walden's face, and his heart beat with an uncomfortable quickness; but, placed between truth and falsehood, he could not—and he did not—hesitate.

"I am afraid it was to the latter, sir," he said, with a little tremor in his full pleasant voice. "Essie is an angel of unselfishness; but Mr. Verner is a self-made man, who places an inordinate value on such dignities. He does not ask for money—he has abundance of that; but his daughter's husbands must give them a high place in the world. The elder is to marry Lord Croxford, and the younger——"

"Sir George de Walden's heir. Poor Frank!"

Sir George turned away abruptly and stood for perhaps five minutes staring out at the lake, from which all the sunset glow had passed. Frank could only see his back and the handsome gray head that was still carried with a proud and stately grace, and wondered, with a sort of restless irritation, when he would turn round and speak—explain his enigmatic questioning and still more singular silence in some reasonable fashion.

At last he could endure it no longer. He crossed to his uncle's side, and as the two stood in the clear revealing light of the wide window, he noticed with surprise the gray pallor that had crept over the fine-featured old face, the troubled appealing look of the gray eyes. It needed no more to touch his kindly heart; and all his irritation passed away. After all, how did he know what troubles weighed upon his uncle's mind, or how much the exertion made for his sake had cost the recluse?

"Why am I 'poor Frank,' and why do you seem so awfully troubled, sir?" he asked brightly; and Sir George looked as though the question relieved him.

"Because—you will hate me when I tell you, Frank."

"I think not; but try me," Frank answered, with a smile.

"Because—you are not my heir."

Frank de Walden put out a hand and caught the back of a tall chair that stood beside him with a steadfast grip, for the room seemed to whirl round in an eccentric fashion, and all the objects in it so mix themselves up in inextricable confusion. He was conscious that he laughed a little loudly, as at some excellent jest, and then somehow he found himself staring at his own face, very white and wild-eyed, in the big glass surmounting an old cabinet that fronted him.

"Not your heir?" he repeated stupidly. "Is it a joke, or——"

"No joke at all. I have been married four years now, and my son, who is of course my heir also, is a fine child, nearly three years old."

An awkward silence followed, during which Frank vainly tried to realise the strange facts he heard, and Sir George to find words that should soften this terrible blow; but these were far to search and long in coming, and Frank was the first to speak after all.

"It is rather late to congratulate you, sir," he said, struggling gallantly with the sickening feeling of disappointment and defeat, the chill forboding that oppressed him; "but the fault is not mine."

"No, indeed," said the elder man, [illegible] the offered hand tightly, and looking apologetically into the dazed young face. "Frank, I have used you shamefully; I never felt that as I felt it to-day."

"You were not [illegible] to [illegible]," Frank broke in, with rather a dreary little smile.

"No; but I had no right to let you nurse a delusion for four years—the four years you might have used so well. Let me think and speak hardly of myself, Frank, just at present; it is my only consolation. By-and-by you shall hear—— No—you shall see my excuse."

"Lady de Walden is here then?"

"Yes. After four years of marriage, she has at last seen her husband's home—poor Anita. I do not know how she will accommodate herself to English ways."

"She is not English?"

"No—an Italian, a mere girl, who, when she married me, knew nothing of my rank or means, and has lived in contented obscurity with me and her child. She is—but I will not tell you what she is—you shall judge for yourself. You look pale and tired now, Frank."

"I am a little tired," Frank answered, rousing himself with an effort. "I think I will go to my ro[illegible] and [illegible] presentable."

What is Catarrh?

From the Mail (Can.) Dec. 15th.

Catarrh is a muco-purulent discharge caused by the presence and development of the vegetable parasite amoeba in the internal lining membrane of the nose. This parasite is only developed under favorable circumstances, and these are:—Morbid state of the blood, as the blighted corpuscle of tubercle, the germ poison of syphilis, mercury, toxoemea, from the retention of the effete matter of the skin, suppressed perspiration, badly ventilated sleeping apartments, and other poisons that are germinated in the blood. These poisons keep the internal lining membrane of the nose in a constant state of irritation, ever ready for the deposits of the seeds of these germs, which spread up the nostrils and down the fauces, or back of the throat, causing ulceration of the throat; up the eustachian tubes, causing deafness; burrowing in the vocal cords, causing hoarseness, usurping the proper structure of the bronchial tubes, ending in pulmonary consumption and death.

Many attempts have been made to discover a cure for this distressing disease by the use of inhalents and other ingenious devices, but none of these treatments can do a particle of good until the parasites are either destroyed or removed from the mucus tissue.

Some time since a well-known physician of forty years standing, after much experimenting, succeeded in discovering the necessary combination of ingredients which never fails in absolutely and permanently eradicating this horrible disease, whether standing for one year or forty years. Those who may be suffering from the above disease should, without delay, communicate with the business managers Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King Street West, Toronto, and get full particulars and treatise free by enclosing stamp.

Formerly the Holy Father drew from the States of the Church an annual civil list of 3,210,000 francs, which was employed in the maintenance of his court, of the Cardinals residing in Curia, of the personnel of the Punciatures, the various congregations, &c. That is the reason why the Italian Government offered Pius IX. the annual State income of 3,200,000 francs. Since the seizure of the Papal States, many other expenses, which formerly were met by other means, have to be undertaken by the Pope's civil list. Leo XIII., moreover, spends about 500,000 francs in alms each year.

English pensioners are very wisely seeking to commute. Until very recently sinecures of the most scandalous character swelled the pension list. A dowager duchess was, for instance, "Collector of the Customs Outward," at the rate of $14,460 a year; a baroness was "Sweeper of the Mall," and a third lady was "Chief Usher" in the Court of Exchequer. A peer's wife was "Custos Brevium," while her brother was a "wine taster" on the Irish civil list. One nobleman was "Comptroller of Forest Rents," and another "Clerk of the Pipe," part of whose duties was to bear the train of the Lord Chancellor. A clergyman was a "Searcher in the Customs," wages $5,200 a year. Lord Leitrim was "Port Searcher" in Dublin, and a Mr. Charsley received $[illegible]000 yearly "for labor in looking up the King's Treasury in 1826."

Fresh from a journey of 4,000 miles in ox cart and ox wagon, up and down the most disturbed districts in South Africa, with the exception of Zululand, the Rev. Wardlaw Thompson, the traveling Secretary of the London Missionary society, reports that in all the tribes of South Africa bad brandy is the greatest curse of the natives. A brandy keg does far more harm than a powder barrel. In North Bechtanaland brandy has been kept out hitherto with considerable success; and in Basutoland, in old times, the import of brandy was forbidden. Since the late Basuto war liquor has been introduced freely. As a result, the chiefs in Basutoland are dipsomaniacs. They drink morning, noon, and night, and many of their absurd actions are attributable, not to the inherent folly of the native nature, but to the baleful influence of the white man's beverage.

The popularity of menageries has always been great, yet they were formerly the luxury of princes. In Russia, for instance, 150 years ago, the grand menageries at St. Petersburg were kept solely for the court. The Empress Anna Ivanovna was passionately fond of hunting; she kept 319 hounds, and was a capital shot. On one occasion (Aug. 1740) she killed 1 wolf, 4 wild boars, 9 [illegible], 16 turkeys, 374 rabbits, 68 ducks, and several large herons—a magnificent bag even for an empress. The numerous elephants of her menagerie were expensive pets, for they were fed on sugar, butter, wheaten bread, wine, and salt. One of them required a large daily portion of brandy, and the keepers were sent to Siberia if a single gill was abstracted from the elephant's portion.

There was a time not long ago when the [illegible] belle slept with gloves on in old [illegible], and by day kept them carefully hidden from the sun, as a fashion writer puts it, [illegible] so that they might look and feel as though they had never come in contact with anything rougher than satin." It is wholly different now. Athletic sports are in high favor. The daughter of wealth grasps the [illegible], bridle and bicycle handle bars, all without gloves; and she is proud of the callous palms which ensue, and the redness of the knuckles that used to be the hue of the lilly. Her liking for outdoor exercise has not yet taken her into the ball field, where her fingers might get permanently disfigured by breakage, but so [illegible] hands are not becoming distorted, though they will never again be quite as white and soft as they were.

In the province of Catania (Sicily) the festival of San Filippo, the patron saint of Calatabiano, is celebrated in a strangely superstitious manner. The ignorant populace believe that San Filippo has the power of restoring to health all those afflicted with epilepsy, hysteria, insanity, or other nervous maladies—in short, that the invocation of the saint is sufficient to cast out the "devil-spirit." On the day of the festival such afflicted persons from all the country around are brought by their relations to be cured instantaneously at the church of Calatabiano. On arriving they are seized by robust peasants, who attempt to make them kiss the image of the saint, and cry, "Viva Sant Fillippo." Some, as might be expected, are too stupid to obey, others struggle furiously in the hands of their captors, who then resort to the most savage means of compulsion, tearing off their clothes, pulling their hair, and even biting them, continuing this torture throughout the day until the victims pronounce the sacramental words. This being accomplished, the unfortunate invalids are again consigned to their relations, who take them home with tears of joy, only to be bitterly undeceived by finding them later on worse than before. This year the same scene was repeated, but was so put a stop to by a police constable, who, in the name of the law arrested all those who refused to renounce the barbarous custom.

The Progress of France.

France again has the reins of foreign empire well in hand. Within a year she has become an Asiatic power, second only to England and Russia, and superior in population to the latter, by planting herself firmly in India. It is less than a year since the war in Tonquin resolved [illegible] in the treaty of peace [illegible], by which that empire became [illegible] a protectorate like the native States of Hindostan, which, though nominally ruled by Hindoo princes, are as absolutely British possessions as though the fiction of native government were not preserved. This added to the French dominion a territory comprising 200,000 square miles—an area nearly as great as that of the German Empire—and having a population, estimated by the best authorities at 21,000,000. Only a day or two since the cable dispatches announced that the King of Cambodia, another Farther Indian State, had transferred his empire to France, receiving in return a fixed income for the royal family. Cambodia has been a semi-protected State since 1867, when France founded its oriental empire by getting possession of the provinces of Cochin China. It now becomes an integral part of the French dominion. It has an area of 32,380 square miles, and a population of something less than 1,000,000. These two States added to the Cochin-China Provinces gives the French empire in Farther India a total area in round numbers of 472,000 square miles with a population of 28,000,000. Besides these there are Pondichery, Karikall, Chandernagore and Mahe—the four cities that alone remain of the former French empire in Hindostan—which contribute a total of 286,000 souls to the present possessions of France in India.

It is 100 years since France, after a long and sanguinary contest that literally bathed Hither India in blood, was driven out of India, retaining only the poor remnants of its large domains above mentioned. But she has now become powerful in another portion of India. Between her possessions and those of England now lie only the native States of Siam and Burmah, rich morsels for which the European neighbors may one day be battling.

And it is not alone in Asia that France has lately been aggrandizing herself. Her African colony of Algeria—conquered in the last half century—has within three years been expanded by the addition of the Regency of Tunis with an area of 45,000 square miles, and a population of 2,100,000. She has also extended her control over the tribes of Senegambia, gained great influence in Madagascar, with a cession of territory, and is about to assume control of Egypt, from the Soudan to the Nile Delta, jointly with England. In Polynesia several groups of islands have been seized, and her American colonial possessions have been increased by the cession of the Swedish West Indies. France, with her colonies and tributary States, not including Madagascar, now has an area of 1,022,797 square miles and a population of 66,821,580, making her, after the Chinese, the British and the Russian Empires, the most populous country of the world. Her recent development of power has been but another instance, like those with which her past history is crowded, of her ability to recover after seemingly crushing defeats. Her dominion is to-day greater than it has ever been since she lost her American territory in 1763—excepting during the brief period that the first Napoleon controlled half of Europe—and the growth has hardly been observed by rival nations. They have undoubtedly discovered, with [illegible] of Anam [illegible] that she has risen from the condition of a State prostrate before its victorious neighbor, to more than its old prominent place among the great nations of the Earth.

Convicted Murderers Cause a Scene.

There was some exciting scenes at the trial of the Westmeath conspirators for the attempt to murder William E. Smythe and other Irish landlords, and who did kill Mrs. Smythe as she was riding home from church last April. Only six of the thirteen prisoners were convicted. These were Patrick and John Fegan, relatives of the Phoenix Park conspirator of the same name; three farmers named Boylan, Gaffney and McGrath, and a poor [illegible] named McCormack. [illegible] were sentenced to penal servitude [illegible] years, except McGrath, in whose case there were mitigating circumstances, and who was let off with one year's imprisonment. When sentence was pronounced the prisoners were astounded. McCormack feebly faltered forth a protestation of his innocence, but the Fegans were furious and defiant. They struggled desperately to escape from the clutches of the warders, and as they were dragged from the dock they yelled out, "We are convicted by a packed jury, but we will be avenged. You will have more to try yet." There was intense excitement in the court room, and several persons in the audience, including men as well as women, fainted. This was the fifth trial of these conspirators, and as it had miscarried by the disagreement of the [illegible] the prosecuting officers [illegible] another trial. The jurors were out two hours, and when they returned they were highly praised by Judge Lawson, who [illegible] them for their justice and courage.

Marriage in Java.

As a small party of us were sitting on the wide piazza of our dwelling houses in Java, one evening, our attention was called to sounds of Malay music evidently approaching us. Looking down on the street we saw a procession of native men (Javanese) marching along to the music, and four abreast. In the second row there were five. The centre one was covered by a large umbrella. I inquired why this man was so honored and was told that he was to be married. The next day I was taken to see the house where the bride lived and where they were making grand preparations for the marriage. They were constructing a large and covered platform of bamboo for the accommodation of the guests and the Malay band of music. On the succeeding day we heard the same performers and saw a longer procession than the first one. And at the head of this procession came two wooden figures (man and woman) about eight feet high. These were hollow; so that the boys could enter and operate to give them motion. Next behind them were the musicians; then an open carriage drawn by two ponies covered with flowers and variously colored papers cut up in patterns. Inside sat the bride and groom. The bride was decked in flowers and jewels, and her face, head and dress were completely covered with yellow ochre powder. A number of carriages followed the party with relatives and friends who were also adorned with flowers, jewels, etc. On the third day I was invited to attend the wedding, so we walked down to the bride's house. There we found the bamboo platform occupied by a band of music and an exhibition of marionettes, which personated characters in legends of the Javanese people. The hadji, or native priest, was conducting this novel show, which took hours to go through. I, however, was more anxious to see the bride, and accordingly was ushered into the principal room. It was a large square apartment, the front being opened by four large double doors. In one of the remote corners of the stone floor was seated on a handsome mat the bride elect, with downcast eyes, and in the adjacent corner sat the bridegroom. The bride was fanned by two little girls and the groom by two boys. In the centre of the floor their feast was spread. The festivities lasted through the night, and refreshments were abundantly served to the guests in and about the house at any time and all times just as they called for them. At intervals the dancing girls were introduced and the tam-tams for their dance music. At break of day the groom claimed his wife and escorted her to his own house. They then had a procession similar to the first one, except that the bride's presents were seen carried in front by coolies. At the groom's house festivities were continued according to the length of his purse. It often happens that the people use all the money they have on such occasions. They are improvident and ordinarily live on very small sums, obtaining easily the little they need for maintenance.

One of Nelson's Captains.

When a midshipman made a complaint, Captain Collingwood would order the man for punishment the next day; and, in the interval, calling the boy down to him, would say, "In the probability the fault was yours; but whether it were or not, I am sure it would go to your heart to see a man old enough to be your father disgraced and punished on your account; and it will, therefore, give me a good opinion of your disposition if, when he is brought out, you ask for his pardon." When this recommendation, acting as it did like an order, was complied with, and the lad interceded for the prisoner, Captain Collingwood would make great apparent difficulty in yielding, but at length would say, "This young gentleman has pleaded so humanely for you, that in the hope that you will feel a due gratitude to him for his benevolence, I will for this time overlook your offence." He watched over all his men, attended them when sick, and treated them with unvarying kindness, so that, "though no man less courted what is called popularity, the sailors considered him, and called him their father; and frequently, when he changed his ship, many of the men were seen in tears at his departure." He would not permit his officers to make use of coarse or violent language to the men. "If you do not know a man's name," he would say, "call him sailor, and not you sir, and such other appellations; they are offensive and improper." If he had to reprove an officer, it was always done in few words, and in the language of a gentleman; and, though strict in exacting from them the due performance of every part of their duty, he never teased or worried them with unnecessary trifles. From his superiors, on the other hand, he always expected that respect to which, by his character and station he was entitled.

A Beer King.

Baron Bass, the great English brewer, is dead. His business in selling beer alone amounted to $12,000,000 yearly. His London stores covered six acres of ground, all of which was needed for his barrels and hogsheads. He paid $4,000 a day in internal revenue taxes. Bass' ale is sent in immense quantities to every part of the world. Baron Bass was thirty-five years a member of Parliament, and he was so proud of his name and business that he refused a peerage. Bass was a generous giver to churches, charitable institutions, and reading rooms for the poor. Beer brewers, by the way, seem to be an exception to other liquor dealers in the good they try to do; Vassar, who gave the young women of America their first college, was a brewer; Guinness, the manufacturer of the famous porter, that bears his name, was notable for his benefactions.

Never Mind.

It is not worth while for any one to get angry or discouraged because of the doings of a few misguided, or jealous people; suppose they do get excited, and say things of you behind your back in their anger, or jealousy, they would not say to your face even if they withdraw their former cordial friendship, and think proper to treat you with cool politeness, for time to come, what does it all amount to? If you have done nothing wrong, you are not to blame for what others do; if they have done wrong, they will see the time when they will be sorry for it. Let them alone; if they are satisfied, you should be; the country is large enough; and there are those in it who would be glad to extend to you the hand of friendship; and with hearts as warm as any you ever knew; don't be discouraged; be independent, [illegible] and you need never want for friends.

THE LATEST DISCOVERY.

A Texas Colonel and His Remarkable [illegible]

While M. Pasteur has been engaged in discovering a cure for hydrophobia, Col. Houston, of Georgia, has discovered a cure for rattlesnake poisoning. In both cases the cure is brought about by inoculation with attenuated poison germs, and although Col. Houston made his discovery purely by accident, he is as great a benefactor to the race as is M. Pasteur.

Col. Houston was hunting in a Georgia swamp with two other colonels when he was suddenly, and without the slightest deliberation, bitten by a rattlesnake. The two unbitten colonels must have been men of unusual powers of absorption, for when the accident occurred there was not a drop of whiskey left in the party. Whisky, as is well known, is an antidote to rattlesnake poison if it is administered in doses of a pint at a time, and the dose is repeated at brief intervals. No attempt was made to give whisky to Col Houston, which shows that all the whisky in the three flasks of the three colonels was exhausted. Moreover, the moment Col. Houston was bitten, the two colonels went in search of a medical colonel. The services of the latter would not have been sought had not the bitten man been in imminent danger, and he would not have been in danger if he had already had his full share of whisky carried by the hunting party. Hence we find by an exhaustive process of reasoning that Col. Houston's two friends were men of great capacity in point of whisky, and they doubtless felt, as they rushed away after the nearest medical colonel, that they selfishly imperiled their friend's life.

Left to himself, Col. Houston lay down under a cypress tree, wrote a brief letter in lead pencil announcing that he was about to die at the hand of a rattlesnake, and exhorting all surviving colonels to carry an extra supply of whisky with them whenever engaged in hunting in rattlesnake regions. Having thus prepared for death, the colonel closed his eyes, and the local mosquitoes prepared to do their best work.

The mosquitoes of Tuscuma[illegible] swamp are of immense size and strength. They fell upon Col. Houston in thick clouds, and bit him at the rate of two hundred per minute. In fifteen minutes the colonel felt that he could bear their assaults no longer, and thereupon rose up and began to flee from the swamp. He still entertained the idea of dying, but resolved to die in some locality less infested by mosquitoes. The mosquitoes, however, followed him until he was entirely out of the swamp and half way to his own home. Finding that the rattlesnake bite was causing him no inconvenience, he resolved to go home and go to bed, which he accordingly did, and woke up the next morning perfectly well, to the unbounded astonishment of all the colonels of that part of the State of Georgia.

The facts of this case are beyond dispute. Col. Houston was bitten on the calf of the right leg by a large rattlesnake, was treated by a million or so of mosquitoes, and entirely recovered. This establishes beyond a possibility of doubt that inoculation with mosquito poison is an antidote to rattlesnake poison—a fact which will henceforth deprive the rattlesnake of all his peculiar terrors.

We may assume from the analogy furnished by the investigations of M Pasteur that the poison of the mosquito is identified with that of the rattlesnake, and differs from it only in the fact that it is greatly attenuated. It cures rattlesnake poisoning in the same way that inoculation with the attenuated virus of rabies cures hydrophobia. We have here an explanation of the origin of the mosquito. That much-maligned insect exists wherever the rattlesnake exists, and is created solely in order that an antidote to snake-poisoning may always be within reach. Hereafter, when a man is bitten by a rattlesnake, he will constantly expose a large amount of his surface to mosquitoes, and wait patiently until they have bitten him sufficiently to render the rattlesnake's poison harmless. No longer will the temperance man be compelled, much against his will, to take whisky with him on his fishing and hunting excursions, as an antidote to possible snake poisoning; and those timid souls who, in their fear of rattlesnakes, have forced themselves to use whisky as a prophylactic, will be able totally to dispense with that loathsome and noxious medicine.

Life.

Life is made up of gain and loss; and often the gain comes only through the loss. Even when one attains to the possession of that which is best, achievement is saddened by the thought that it has been won by the sacrifices of many things which would have been good in themselves, but which could not be held with the one supreme good. Each new conquest in human life is like the dawning of a new day; as the sky reddens and brightens, the stars fade out. Yet when the sun has risen high over the horizon, and has flooded the heavens with its light, who mourns for the departed glory of the stars? It aught to be so also in the other sphere. As the light of life emerges into clearer shining, the minor lights are lost in the glory, not by any merely arbitrary law, but because in the new splendor they have no power of shining; and he is surely ungrateful who mourns that the former things in which he had delighted have sunk into insignificance before the greater blessings which now are lavished upon him. Let the cold beauty of the stars fade out, if we have instead the warm shining of the sun; let the silent solemnity of the night pass by, unmourned for, since our are the life and movement of the sunlit day.

Quite a Difference.

A scientific paper announces that in its next issue will appear an elaborate article entitled, "How to Handle Bees." Now a bee is not a difficult thing to handle. He is easily picked up as a strawberry, and is reasonably light and compressible. To handle him, is therefore, a mere song. Any man can do it. In fact, the more ignorant of bees a man is, the more easily he can handle one. The main difficulty seems to be in quieting the man down after he has handled a small, but frolicsome bee. [illegible] have been men known to race around a ten-acre lot, and eventually lose their salvation after handling one bee for the tenth part of a second. The scientific journal means well, no doubt; but what the country really needs is an article on how to avoid handling bees.—Life.

SOCIABLE SPERM WHALES.

Behaving Like Pollywogs Around the Good Ship M. B. Millen.

Capt. Young of the schooner M. B. Millen which arrived in New York recently with a cargo from Savannah, told this story to a reporter:

"On Friday morning last the wind began to die out. At noon we were in a dead calm off Cape Hatteras. The sea was placid and the bright sunlight covered it like a golden counterpane. Suddenly the water began to spout up on all sides of us, and we saw a lot of dark, smooth bodies pitching about. It was a school of whales.

"We could see them as far as the eye could reach in any direction. They swam so close to us that we could have reached them with a common harpoon. They would lie perfectly still for a while, and then roll leisurely over and sink down, tail foremost. They remained in this perpendicular position for several minutes, and, as the water was clear, we could easily measure them with the eye. They seemed to be between 35 and 40 feet long. They had square, blunt heads and small eyes. Their blow was low and looked like water thrown from a sprinkler. They had small round fins on the back, and square flukes. They swam around us for about three hours. They were not the least shy, and seemed to be taking a complete survey of us. We threw several pieces of wood at them, but they didn't appear to mind it much. One of the men hit a big fellow on the nose with a heavy chunk of oak. He threw his flukes high in the air, lashed the water into foam, and dived out of sight. He came up shortly afterward, swam alongside of us, and lay there several minutes, as if he meant to let us know he was not afraid. Then he rolled over several times, as if he were fairly bursting with mirth, and leisurely sculled away to the eastward.

"We could have harpooned a dozen of them, but we didn't like to do it after seeing the careless conduct of the the big one we hit with the oak. We thought they would make a combined assault on us with their flukes and stir us up considerably. We watched them for three hours. Then a light breeze sprang up, and we sailed away from them."

The Walled Lake of Iowa.

Noteworthy among American antiquities is the Walled Lake of Iowa. Imagine a body of water, covering nearly three thousand acres, with a wall built up around it, not a stone of which can be less than one hundred pounds in weight, and some as heavy as three tons, and yet there's not a stone to be found in ten miles of the lake. The wall is ten feet high, about fifteen feet wide at the bottom, and five on top. The country is prairie land for miles around, except a belt of heavy that encircles the lake. This timber is oak, and it is plain that the trees were planted there. They are very large. The belt is probably half a mile wide. The water in the lake is twenty-five feet deep, as cold as ice, and as clear as crystal. What I would like to know is, who built that wall? And how did they hold the water back while they were building it? And how did they cart those immense stones for ten miles? If ever you go to Iowa, don't fail to visit the walled lake. You'll find it in the county of Wright, one hundred and sixty miles from Dubuque. The cars will take you almost to it.

The Standard.

MARKDALE JULY. 8, 1884.

Two Day's Late.

Owing to being this week overpowered with job work of an urgent nature we have been compelled to issue the STANDARD two days late. As this is the first time we have been so much behind in four years, we know our many subscribers will not grumble.

Dominion Day in Markdale.

The horse races and sports took pace on the handsome grounds of Glenelg Agricultural Society, adjoining the village, where good order was maintained throughout and universal satisfaction given. In the horse races there was close competition. Two bycycles were on the ground, but one of them happened with an accident before the rase commenced by which it was disabled, Mr. McDowell of Chatsworth however gave an exhibition on the wheel which proved very interesting to the spectators, and highly creditable to himself as as an amateur. He also appeared on the Street's during the evening showing remarkable speed on a rough track, this latter exhibition was highly appreciated by the citizens, the majority of whome have never had an oppertunity of witnessing such.

Following are the prizes awarded: Open Race, 1st E. Large; 2nd J. H. Carson; Owing to Carson's horse bolting across the corner of the course the Judges decided to give the next horse, Burnside's half the prize money. Open Trot, 1st G. S. Brown; 2nd J. H. Carson: Local Trot, 1st J. H. Carson; 2nd M. Bebee.

Bycicle Race, 1st R. McDowell; Putting Caber, 1st D. McLellan; 2nd Wm. Dodds; 100 yds. race, 1st D. McCormick; 2nd A. Bryan; Boys foot race, 1st M. Fleming; 2nd W. Mathers; Tug of War, 1st A Hutton, Captain.

THE GARDEN PARTY.

The Garden Party under the auspices of the Ladies of Christ Church in the evening was well attended and a most enjoyable time was spent, a platform was erected and covered where select music was rendered with Violin, Organ, &c. the various performers in this respect proved themselves master of their position, the music was inded excellent.

Strawberries, Ice-Cream &c. were served in prime condition, and the stalls were well patronized, the refreshment were choice throughout, and the party a genuine success. A Calithumpian torchlight procession marched into the grounds, mounted the platform and gave an indian war dance which highly amused the company, after which the captain delivered an oration. The net proceeds amounted to the handsome sum of $50.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsib'e for the opinions expressed by our correspondents

To the Editor af the Standard.

SIR.—Will you be kind enough to give space for the following: A report has been freely circulated in the neighborhood of Markdale, to the effect that my sisters are suing all parties who have put their mares to my horse, whether in foal or not as they own the horse. Now I give the report a flat denial, as my sisters or any body else but myself never owned the horse. I would like Mr. Henry Lever to prove his statements and not go round telling lies because he cannot get the use of the horse at any price.

DAVID MADILL.

Vandeleur, June 30th, 1884.

To the Editor of the Standard.

SIR.—I see by the last weeks issue of the Flesherton squabbler that I have been treated to, what that base authority on everybodys business is pleased to term a "snubbing", said snubbing being got up in that mean insinuating style peculiar to the Advance and although I exceedingly fear and tremble at his threats for the future, I must try and enlighten him a little. In the first place I never asked for one line of space in the Advance as insinuated, in the next place, if I did want to make a goose of myself I would not apply there, as that department of the sheet is already overdone by the Editor, and if the sanctimonious caviveller will tell me whether it was his big head; which by the way was a very hollow pretence to build a paragraph on, or his big "pipe" that I did not treat with "becoming decorum" (for they are the only things he seems to hold sacred) I will try and do better in future, and I would advise him, and others whose bodies are polluted, intellects beclouded, and whose very souls are shrivelled by the fumes of satan's five cent plugs to try and remember in future that the "sanctity of high heaven" is not in need of such grimly champions. LIBERTY.

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—I noticed in your issue of June 26th, an item from your Meaford Road correspondent which I wish to correct. It refers to a meeting of our U. S. School concerning our annual pic-nic. It was not decided to go to Owen Sound, but only proposed to inquire whether we could get an excursion or not, and on what terms and when. A committee was appointed to get this information. The second meeting was not called on account of any dis-satisfaction, for I do not think there was any, but simply to hear the report of the committee. Everything was perfectly harmonious and the motions passed, were unanimous, and we should feel obliged if your correspondent would confine his items to facts, and in future if we wish our proceedings published we will instruct our Secretary to do so I think he is more capable of giving the correct minutes than one who was not there at all. "Our own correspondent" some time ago gave to the public through the local papers an in-correct report of our S. School financial statement and we hope that if he must write something he will take the trouble to better inform himself of the facts.

At our second meeting we decided to have our pic-nic at the usual place on the 4th day of July, and also to have an excursion to Owen Sound if satisfactory arrangements can be made However that will be duly advertised in time to give all a chance of a cheap trip.

Signed on behalf of the U. S. School, Meaford Road.

To the Editor of the Standard.

ST. JOHN.—The members of Prince Arthurs Lodge No. 333 A. F. & A. M., G. R. C., celebrated the anniversary of St. John by tendering a banquet to their wives and sweethearts in their Lodge Room on the evening of the 24th ult.

At the hour of "12" Worthy Bro. McFarland was escorted to the Worthy Master's chair, and in an eloquent and impressive oration stated the cause of the anniversary and the object of the meeting.

After each one had satisfied himself or herself with the good things with which the table was loaded, the following toasts were drunk and duly honored.

1st the Queen and Royal family, 2nd the Craft, 3rd the Dominion and Governor General, 4th the Army and Navy, 5th Sister Societies, 6th the Learned Profession, 7th Agriculture and commerce, 8th our Wives and Sweethearts.

The above toasts were responded to by Worthy Bros. McFarland Damude. Richardson, and Bros. Sproule, Gordon, McMaster, Blackburn, Elliott, Strain, Bellamy, Heslop, Field, and Dr. Hickson. Worthy Bro. Richardson then proposed the toast our Worthy Post Master (Bro. McFarland) this was responded to by all the brethren rising to their feet and singing "He's a jolly good fellow" After the brethren had resumed their seat, Worthy Bro. Richardson in behalf of the Lodge presented Worthy Bro. McFarland with a Postmaster's Jewell. We might state here that the Jewell is of solid gold, formed in the shape of a square, each side of which is about three inches long and about one inch broad, in the centre is suspended the figure of the 47th proposition of the 1st Book of Euclid. Worthy Bro. McFarland's name is engraved on each side of the square, in fact the whole workmanship is a credit to the manufacturer (Mr. Morris of Toronto.) In reply the Worthy Bro. gave a very eloquent address. We are sorry space forbids us giving it in detail as it was practical, interesting and instructive.

When the toast "Our Wives and Sweethearts" was proposed by our worthy chairman, he suggested that it be drunk in silence. Why this excellent and venerable toast should be thus treated we are at a loss to know, perhaps it is on account of the conjunction "and" This toast you must remember is one of the most ingenious setiments ever devised by evasive man. Its origin is lost in the mists of antiquity, but it was no doubt connected before latch keys were invented. Is that "and" a conjunctive conjunction or a disjunctive conjunction? It is perhaps both. It suits the convivial hour of the banquet, and it will pass muster under domestic inspection at any hour of the morning. It may mean for the worldly that there are sweethearts and there are also wives, and it may mean when it must in the hour when an account has to be given that sweethearts and wives are the same person. We are of the opinion however that a sweetheart is good, a wife is better, best of all is a sweetheart and wife in one person.

This very pleasantly was brought to a close by all joining hands, and singing, "Auld Lang Syne".

Irish Lake Pic-Nic.

The eighth annual pic-nic at the Irish Lake was held on Thursday the 26th, and was, as usual in every way a success. There was a large turnout and an enjoyable time was spent. Owing to the expected monster excursion from Owen Sound on that day. Many from Markdale were unable to put in an appearance at the pic-nic. The large dancing platform which is the centre of attraction to a large number was well patrionized, while the music by Parks Bros., was excellent. The athletic games were gone through, and everything passed off with harmony and satisfaction. The unswerving moral principle together with genial and business like deportment of Father Cassin go a great way in making this festival an enjoyable one.

Another Roller Mill.

Plewes Bro's of Markdale have let the contract, for their new mill and will have a force on next week putting in a full line of rollers, and in order to do so they will pull down the old mill and build greater. This improvement will cost soms $6,000. Markdale will have this fall two of the best flour mills in the county which will materially assist in drawing a greatly increased trade to the place.

A farmer in Arthur township left part of his crop of '83 and threshed it the 9th June, ult., so that he could blow about being the first of the season to thresh grain.

STRAWBERRIES &c.—There will be a Sabbath School pic-nic and strawberry festival in connection with the Methodist S. S. in Markdale, on Friday afternoon the 4th July. Strawberries and ice-cream served from 5 to 8.

WE regret to learn that it is owing to ill health that our esteemed young friend R. H. Whitby is home from Orangeville. A bloodvessel having burst recently causing bleeding from the lungs, he is in rather a week state at present.

65 bushels of wheat to the acre might be cut by using Hamilton's Maston grain cradle. Farmers don't fail to examine them, great improvement this season, every cradle will swing so easy and hang so well that it will make the old man feel young again to get hold of one of them. Ask your store keeper for them and take no other.

"You can do anything if you have patience," said an old uncle, who had made a fortune, to his nephew, who had nearly spent one. "Water may be carried in a sieve, if you only wait." "How long?" asked the penitent spendthrift. "Till it freezes," was the cold reply.

HOME INFLUENCE.—The future of our country depends upon the youth of the land. While education, then, in the usual sense of the word, should be highly valued, as the same time our people should not forget the most important education from home influence, and home discipline.

ACCIDENT.—One day last week while P. Ducolon and Robt. Sproule were driving, a front wheel suddenly broke down throwing both parties out and also throwing the horse, the three were considerably shaken up and more or less wounded, but they are all recovering except the buggy wheel which is still in a critical condition.

LEAP YEAR.—You talk about this being leap year but read the following: Mrs. Margaret Finlayson, a widow lady from Balshrire Scotland, arrived in Walkerton last Saturday afternoon direct from the old sod. At ten in the evening she was married to Mr. Alex. Bonniman, sr., of Brant, a man whom she had never previously seen. "Business."

THAT Canada is rising in general favor abroad can no longer be doubted. Its fame is now spreading. A leading American, Professor L. B. Arnold, is compelled to admit, in a letter to the Live Stock Journal of Chicago, that "Canada has become the greatest cheese producing country on the continent, if not in the world, in proportion to population."

AN INVOLUNTARY BATH.—Ex-Warden McNichol, after viewing the magnificent proportions of the C. P. R. steamers Algoma and Athabasca, which were lying in our harbor on Wednesday afternoon, was seized with the desire to become a sailor bold, and undertook to ferry a passenger across the perilous waters of the Sydenham river oppsite the railway dock, but owing to some mishap the boat which the gallant ex-Warden was in command of upset, and he and his passenger were precipitated into the raging waters. Fortunately however, they were both rescued without anything more serious than a good soaking. Several of Mr. McNichol's fellow councillors and a large crowd of Italians were much edified by the unexpected entertainment, and considerable excitement prevailed for a while.—O. S. Advertiser.

HASKETT Bro's are building an addition to the Revere Hotel kitchen which will very materially improve the house, they have also erected an addition to their hardware for a workshop.

The Methodist S. S. pic-nic and strawberry, festival was shaping just right for a grand success on Friday evening when a shower blew up scattering the crowd and thus broke up the festivity while in its prime.

MRS. R. J. SPROULE, of Flesherton, who has been in a very week state of health for several months past died on Wednesday, and was buried on Friday afternoon, the funeral was very largely attended deceased was a faithfull deveted wife and mother, and a model christian, her end was peace.

IT RAINED FISH.—During the heavy thunder shower about two weeks ago a fish fell with the rain in Bowlers' brick yard, near this village. It was about ten inches long and of a silver color. Wesley Bowler had his hands on it and determined to farther examine of what species it was but the scaly fish slipped from his grasp and made its way into the pond a few feet distant where it is, probably still living.

C. O. O. F, EXCURSION.—The Owen Sound excursion to this place on Thursday last was almost a total failure in point of number. The reason we understand being a division among themselves as to whether they would excurt by rail or by boat. Those who did come however were highly pleased with their day's recreation, and also the way their brethren and others entertained them while in Markdale. The day was most beautiful and a very enjoyable time was spent.

INVALUABLE TO EVERY LADY!

"MAY DEW"

The Great French Lotion for Beautifying the Face.

It conceals the evidences of age. One application will make the most stubbornly red and rough hands beautifully soft and white. Remember that "MAY DEW" is not a paint or powder that fills up the pores of the skin, and that is injurious to the skin, but a new and great discovery, a vegetable liquid, that causes the cheek to glow with health, the neck, arms and hands to rival the Lily in whiteness. Impossible to detect in the beauty it confers any artificial character. It cures greasy Skin, Freckles, Wrinkles, Pimples, Black Heads, Crow's Feet, Blotches, Face Grubs, Sun Burn, Tan, Ringworm, Chapped Hands, Sore or Chapped Lips, Barber's Itch, Tetter, etc. It frees the pores, oil glands, and tubes from the injurious effects of powders and cosmetic washes. By its use all redness and roughness are prevented; it beautifies the skin, and will make it soft, smooth and white; imparting a delicious softness; imparting a perfectly healthy, natural and youthful appearance. The best face lotion that the world ever produced. We will send "A LARGE BOTTLE" to any address on receipt of price, $1. When ordering mention this paper.

Address all letters to the MAY DEW AGENCY, 167 Church Street, Toronto, Ont. Parlor and Reception Room for Ladies.

MARKDALE

Steam Woollen Mill.

The undersigned would respectfully return thanks to their many customers and friends for the very liberal support accorded to them during the past, and would solicit a continuance of the same, as we are now ready to attend to all work intrusted to our care in CUSTOM CARDING, FULLING and WEAVING in first-class style. As we have put on new cards, and made other improvements, we will endeavor to do as good work in the future, if not better, than we have ever done in the past.

Customers wishing to have their wool carded, spun and made into blankets or flannel, on cotton warp, can have their orders attended to by leaving their wool as early as possible.

Please remember the place, Mill Street, west of the Railway Station,

F. J. RITCHIE & Co.

GRAINS OF GOLD.

It is not death that makes the martyr, but the cause.

There is no power of genius that can do the work of toil.

True merit like a river, the deeper it is, the less noise it makes.

The secret of happiness is never to allow your energies to stagnate.

We ought not to judge of men's merits by the use they make of them.

The rays of happiness, like those of light, are colorless when unbroken.

The truly valiant dare everything but doing any other body an injury.

He surely is most in want of another's patience who has none of his own.

There is a majesty in simplicity which is far above the quaintness of wit.

Religion is not a thing of noise and spasm, but of silent self-sacrifice and quiet growth.

There are always a few who believe in the quadrature of the circle and the perpetual motion.

Life consists in the alternate process of learning and unlearning; but it is often wiser to unlearn than to learn.

Never fear to bring the sublimest motive to the smallest duty and the most infinite comfort to the smallest trouble.

Who is wise? he that learns from every one. Who is powerful? he that governs his passions. Who is rich? he that is content.

There are a great many duties that cannot wait. Unless they are done the moment they present themselves, it is not worth while to do them at all.

Perhaps your master knows what a capital plowman you are; and he never means to let you become a reaper because you do the plowing so well.

Good breeding is the art of showing men, by external signs, the internal regard we have for them. It arises from good sense, improved by conversing with good company.

Virtue consists in making desire subordinate to duty, passion to principle. The pillars of character are moderation, temperance, chastity, simplicity, self-control; its method is self-denial.

Let no private affection blind thee in another man's cause; for the errors thou shalt thereby commit are often without remedy, and at the expense both of thy reputation and fortune.

It is when we come to rejoice in duty, to take pleasure in sacrifice, to follow justice, mercy, and truth, not only with the firm and steady step, but with a loving and tender clasp, that we realize the true vitality of righteousness.

The mind of the scholar, if you would have it large and liberal, should come in contact with other minds. It is better that his armour should be somewhat bruised by rude encounters even, then hanging forever rusting on the wall.

That every day has its pains and sorrows is universally experienced and most universally confessed; but let us not attend only to mournful truths; if we look impartially about us, we shall find that every day has likewise its pleasures and its joys.

The fishermen of Brittany, so the story goes, are wont to utter this simple prayer when they launch their boats upon the deep: "Keep me, my God; my boat is so small and Thy ocean is so wide." How touchingly beautiful the words and the thought!

Nothing in the range of our conceptions can equal the dread silence of conscience, the calm desperation of remorse, the corroding of insatiable desire, the entire want of truth, the gnawing worm of envy, the bitter cup of disappointment, the blighting curse of hatred. These pushed to their extremity may be enough to destroy the soul.

When amiability descends to weakness, it loses all claims to respect or admiration. To be worthy of regard it must be strong, and to be strong it must stand on a solid foundation. He who is able and willing to say "No" firmly whenever the cause of right requires it, will say "Yes" with a fuller and a richer meaning at all other times.

A rule for living happily with other is to avoid having stock subjects of disputation. It mostly happens when people live much together, and they come to have certain set topics around which, from frequent dispute, there is such a growth of angry words, mortified vanity, and the like, that the original subject of difference becomes a standing subject for quarrel; and there is a tendency in all minor disputes to drift down to it.

Hope.

Hope! What would life be without hope? Hope and faith is the well spring of our existence; we labor, and hope, and have faith that we will obtain some good result of our labor. It is said without hope hearts would break; and yet what threads hope will sometimes cling to. The mariner in mid-ocean, with his ship sinking beneath the waves, casts himself in the sea hoping he may drift to land somewhere, or be picked up by some unexpected vessel crossing his path; sometimes for days he will battle with the waves, till rescue comes or death closes the scene. But the grandest hope of all is the hope of a happy immortality in the world to come. Free from sin and sorrow, care and pain; a rest from all anxieties; where all is peace, where all is love; where God is. He fills heaven; and He is love. Then let us pray that we may have such a hope, and for faith, patiently, to labor and to wait till our Creator calls us from our probation here, and ushers us in the realms of peace that know no ending.

How Much per Head.

In 1875, the consumption of ardent spirits in Great Britain was 1.31 gallon per head. The present consumption is 1.03, which shows a considerable falling-off-off. The consumption of wine is 2½ bottles per head. It should be remembered that this represents what would be the consumption of every man, woman, and child, if all took exactly the same quantity. Tobacco in 1877 was consumed at the rate of 1.49 lb. per capita. This too has fallen off to 1.37 lb. The figures also show that while the consumption of ardent spirits and tobacco has fallen off, there has been a large increase in the use of tea and cocoa; but, strange to say, coffee has fallen off in consumption from 1868 of fully 4 per cent. This last result is due, it is said, to the adulteration of coffee by chicory. Not being able to get a pure article, people will not buy the fraudulent concoction called coffee in the grocery stores.

Bombay Street Scenes.

Bombay is exceedingly interesting to me, I love to soak my handkerchief in camphor, and then start off in the edge of the evening for a long ramble ... danger from cholera and other prevalent ...

Here is a single lone Chinaman ... stepping along to his shoe shop. Here is a group of my esteemed countrymen, as I immediately gather from the gilt inscription, "U. S. S. Trenton," around their hat bands, and also from their blue sailor suits. They are slightly moistened with ... I can see, and I have grave doubts as to the nature of their ..., but they compare so favorably with the men from the British ships in conduct, that I do not rebuke them as I pass by. Here are some bootblacks, the first I have seen since leaving San Francisco. Your shoes are always blacked by the hotel porter, or the steamer porter, or the boarding house porter in these parts, so that the business of the street urchin is sadly injured. I do not hear the familiar American cry, "Shine yer boots!" These Hindoo bootblacks should visit New York and see how it is done.

Here a great crowd of natives are looking off at the sky over the bay. I look also, but see nothing. I move on further until I come in sight of the seashore, when I discover thousands and thousands of people sitting down and gazing at the black cloudless sky. I ferret out a Parsee (the Parsees almost always speak English) and he explains it all to me. This is the first day of the Hindoo New Year, and it is a great national custom to look for the new moon. After much looking I discover the queen of night—the smallest crescent I have ever seen.

The streets are thronged with men, women and children, all attired in costumes that are more showy than any I have ever seen elsewhere in the world.

A series of terrific shrieks now rise above the babel of street cries. I elbow my way along to the scene of operations and find that a Hindoo is piercing the nose of one of his daughters, aged perhaps ten years. This is, of course, a part of every Hindoo girl's education, but it is a medicine that is not appreciated in the taking. The means adopted for performing the operation are rather primitive. The child's head is held by one person, while another jams the wire of the jewel through the shrinking cartilage of the nostril.

A Modern Prophet.

The test of a science is the ability to predict. We believe the astronomer, because he is able to foretell within the fraction of a second when an eclipse will begin and when it will end. We put faith in the chemist, also, for we find by experience that, when he puts diverse atoms of matter together, a certain result is sure to follow. Water, for instance, is composed of two gases, oxygen and hydrogen. Spiritualism is discredited because it prophets and mediums cannot foretell. Some of the sciences are so far imperfect that its professors cannot predict with confidence. We know a great deal about the weather for instance, but the Washington Weather Bureau is often mistaken in its forecasts. Much has been said as to the possibility of founding a science of society; but it is conceded that, as yet, the sociologists have not dared to claim they could read the future. All this is apropos of a person who has appeared in Ohio, who makes a claim that he has discovered the law which shows the variations in the prices of commodities. His name is Samuel Benner. He published a book in 1875, in which he made a forcast of the prices of iron, grain, hogs and cotton, up to the year 1891. It must be confessed that he has so far proved remarkably accurate. He said the price of iron would be lowest in 1877—that it would advance and be at its maximum in 1881—and that it would then shrink in value until 1887 or '88. This forecast has not been proved false up to date.

Why He Brought Them Back.

A small boy with an intelligent face went into a fruit dealer's store, and depositing a box of grapes on the counter, stood looking down. "I don't want the grapes, my little fellow," said the dealer; "I've got as many now as I can sell. Take them away." "They are yours," the boy said, looking up. "Mine?" "Yes sir. Yesterday evening I came along here and took this box of grapes from the stand at the door. I knew it was stealin', an' my mother always told me not to take anything that did not belong to me, but I couldn't help it. Just before I left home my little sister that was sick said: "Oh, if I had some grapes like them I saw down town, I could eat 'em." We didn't have no money, an' nobody knowed us, 'cause we had just moved into the house. Mother washed clothes, but when sister got sick she had to quit. When I took the clothes home the lady told me to come next day for the money, but when I went there the house was shut up and the people was gone, so we didn't have any money to get grapes with. Mother said, "Never mind, we will get some money after awhile." I saw her go into the other room, "an' when I watched her she had her face buried in a pillow, an' was prayin'. I came away down town an' stood aroun' a long time waitin' to get a chance,' an' after awhile, when you wasn't lookin'. I took a box an' ran away with it." "But why did you bring it back?" the dealer asked. "Because," replied the boy, choking down a sob, "when I got home the little girl was dead."

Light Under the Ocean.

A submarine electric lamp has just been constructed at Greenock, Scotland, which promises to help reveal many of the mysteries heretofore associated with the bottom of the sea. The Tilly is the name of the vessel that carries this lamp. Its machinery will supply an electric current for a 15,000 candle power lamp, which is to be lowered into the sea for ten fathoms to help the fishermen of Batavia to manage their drift-nets.

The lamp is inclosed in a flint-glass cylinder 9½ inches in diameter. The appearance of the light around the submerged lamp was very remarkable, and the effect marvelously beautiful. It is believed in time that the coasts of all the principal countries will be examined, and mapped out by aid of submarine electric lamps. This will not only be a help to the fishermen, but will render navigation safer, as well as aid the scientists in their explorations of nature.

VOYAGING ON THE RED SEA.

The Thermometer at 150 Degrees—Glorious Sunset—A Ship on Fire.

An eight days' voyage across the Arabian Sea brought the steamer to Aden, near the southern extremity of the great Arabian peninsula. For two days before we had sighted in the dim distance the rocky, sterile coast line; and Aden proved to be no more inviting—in fact, one of the dreariest, most desolate places conceivable. Woe be to the ship that is cast ashore on the Arabian coast. Though the natives may not make a barbecue of you, and dance in real savage style around your bleaching bones, they are apt to take every stitch of clothing you have on, torture you, and ultimately starve you. Sad, indeed, was the recent fate of some men on board the steamers Area and Knight of the Bath, which went ashore some ways out of Aden.

I feel warranted in saying that the days are hot. There is only one portable thermometer abroad, and I experiment some with that. First, I find the coolest place in the ship a passage-way leading out of the main saloon, where a register brings up a (relatively) cool draught from the lower region of the ship. The midday register for the passage varies from 88 degrees Fahrenheit to 88 degrees. In the cabins the temperature is very much higher. The garments of those who sweat profusedly are wringing wet with perspiration, whilst the hands and faces of those who do not are so clammy that you would think they had been smeared with grease. Unfortunately, the thermometer in question only registers as high as 150 degrees. I put it out on the hatchway in the sun one day. The mercury trots right up to 150 degrees in no time, and I hasten to bring the instrument in, lest it should explode.

And yet they tell me this is literally cool in comparison with the condition of things that will prevail a month or two hence. Every one on the ship says so. I wonder how high the temperature would raise a thermometer in the sun?

It is indeed hot but one becomes in a measure inured to it after a day or two, and frequent salt water baths serves to make life more tolerable. In the hot months there are always a number of passengers and laborers, especially stokers, who perish from excessive heat. Even our hens and ducks are unable to endure the warmth, and several of the panting creatures expire, despite the frequent drenchings with fresh water which the steward gives them by means of a sprinkling pot.

The sunsets are glorious and the moon rises even more so. Indeed, the evenings are pleasant and we are tempted to sleep out on the deck instead of in our stuffy cabins. This, however, the captain forbids, on account of the peculiar influences of the moon in this climate. The rays of a tropical moon poisons meat, and our supplies are tested with a piece of silver in the boiling waters. Any discoloration of the silver indicates that the meat has been exposed to the moonshine. One indiscreet sailor sleeps on deck, and in the morning his face is wrenched out of shape. After this we are careful, and sit under the awning while we spin our sea yarns. The dews at night are very heavy and leave a thick saline deposit on the ship's rigging. Occasionally a mirage furnishes us with diversion. The phosphorescent displays of the Arabian and Red Seas are not what I had expected after reading and hearing so much of them; but perhaps this is owing to the supernatural brilliance of the moon. The phosphorescence is however, sui generis so far as I have seen. It floats about in apparent "chunks," which attach themselves to the sides of the vessel and are impelled forward for a time, only to become detached at length, and quickly disappear astern.

Here on the Red Sea, for the first time in my seventy-five days and nights of sea voyaging, I have a taste of what a fire on shipboard implies. One hot, breathless day the chief officer is having a large kettle of a resinuous liquid boiled, up forward on a deck stove, for application to certain parts of the ship. It is left alone for a moment, boils over into the fire, and in a moment more the whole mass is ablaze. The liquid flows over deck, and almost before we can take the fact in great sheets of flame are leaping half way up to the square sails. The alarm is sounded, the sailors rush to the sand-barrels, and by the time each man has thrown a pailful of sand upon the deck there is nothing left burning but the kettle. Over this a courageous fellow throws a piece of sail-cloth, and two other men lift it to the deck. In the meantime the captain has ordered the donkey engines to work, and there is an immense stream ready to play upon the deck, were such a measure necessary.

I confess that my heart is thumping away wildly, but none of the officers or men seem any more concerned than if such a scene were of daily occurrence on shipboard.

A few men have been wounded or burned in the operation, while some others have lost part of their clothing. I suppose no more dangerous form of fire could break out, and yet it is handled with perfect ease and does not create a ripple of excitement. In three minutes it has ceased to be a subject of comment.

The Distribution of Fish.

One of the most marvelous and successful achievements of modern enterprise is the introduction of new fish food into the streams and lakes of the various continents. The salmon of the Pacific coast has been successfully introduced into the streams of the east coast of North America. The delicious shad of our waters is now to be found in the sea going rivers of the Pacific coast. California salmon were successfully introduced in 1877 into the Australian rivers, where that fine fish had never before been seen. The re-stocking of streams with fish is going on all over the world, and will eventually increase the supply of fish food a thousand-fold. In England, black bass and white fish have become naturalized, while the German carp, a fast-growing and food-producing fish, is already widely known in the United States. Our experts do not despair of being able in time to vastly increase the swarms of fish on our sea-coast. It is known that from time to time there is a short supply of salt-water fish, but experiments are now being made with the spawn of cod, haddock, sea bass, Spanish mackerel, and other denizens of the ocean, which will undoubtedly be successful. It is said that an acre of water can be made to furnish many times the quantity of food produced annually by an acre of land.

FARM AND GARDEN.

Dry earth makes good bedding for cattle in midsummer.

Hickory and sheep ... thirty years before they are valuable for timber, maple twenty years, and beeches fifteen years.

The Shire horse of England, it is claimed, has better feet, better bone, better balance, and more constitution than any other draught breed.

Machines for planting potatoes have been invented in Scotland, and were exhibited in Inverness last year. The machine plants two drills at once.

Farmers should enjoy, above all others, the luxuries of the garden, and yet, strange to say, but few farms have complete gardens, and many farmers buy vegetables.

A farmer can well afford to raise cabbage for three cents a head. And the crop has this great advantage—if it cannot be sold it may be fed out on the farm to cows, sheep or pigs.

Every garden should have a small bed of sage, thyme, savory, parsley and marjoram. In fact no garden is complete without them. They can be grown from seed, and once obtained remain for a long time.

In Northern Dakota, lately, a traction engine drew eight ploughs, turning a sod four inches thick as evenly and well as could be done by horse-power, and at a rate of over twenty-five acres a day.

An expert in strawberry culture asserts that in transplanting the strawberry the runners should be left on to the length of six inches. The end of the runners are then to be bent down and buried with the roots, and act as suckers to draw nourishment to the plant until new roots are formed.

Some poulterers affirm that fowls cannot be fed too much, that liberal feeding is essential to large egg production. It depends somewhat on the way fowls are fed, and the breed. The Asiatic varieties used to be excited to exercise, and unless they get it in securing their food they will become too lazy and fat to lay eggs. The non-sitting varieties can hardly be fed too much for profit, especially if wheat may go in the market, it is always worth a dollar or more per bushel to feed to laying hens.

Benefits of draining.—Among the other benefits which draining secures to land, the prevention of excessive evaporation, by means of which wet land is continually kept at a low temperature, is not the smallest. And this evaporation is most active in hot weather so that the land is deprived of the warmth which is indespensible to vegetation at the very time when that warmth would be of the greatest service and when it is most available. The only way by which stagnant water can escape from land is by evaporation, or, in other words, by exhalation into vapour, and, though perhaps not equally well known, it is equally true that heat is dispersed or becomes latent by the conversion of water into vapour. It is in obedience to this law that human beings catch cold when their clothes are wet through and they expose themselves to the air; evaporation immediately commences, the system is chilled, and a cold is the result; and precisely the same evils play on a wet soil which is exposed to sun and wind. The cooling effect is well illustrated by swathing a bottle of water in wet flannel and placing it out it the sun; if the flannel is kept moist, the more will be the evaporation, and the colder will be the water inside the botale. To reduce the effect of evaporation to tangible figures, it may be stated that in the process of carrying off a gallon of water by evaporation the soil is deprived of as much heat—heat, remember, that is indispensible to vegetation—as would raise 5½ gallons of water from freezing to boiling point; it is not surprising, therefore, that everywhere wet land is known to be cold land. Heat, again, will pass only a very short distance downwards in water, because water is a bad heat-conductor, and if a soil is saturated with water the warmth of the atmosphere cannot penetrate it.

Canals.

Some out-of-the-way data respecting the great canals of the world are published. The Imperial Canal of China is over 1,000 miles long. In the year 1681 was completed the greatest undertaking of the kind on the European Continent, the Canal of Languedoc, or the Canal du Midi, to connect the Atlantic with the Mediterranean; its length is 148 miles, it has more than 100 locks and about fifty aqueducts, and its highest part is navigable for vessels of upward of 100 tons. The largest ship canal in Europe is the great North Holland Canal, completed in 1825—125 feet wide at the water surface, thirty-one feet wide at the bottom, and which has had a depth of twenty feet; it extends from Amsterdam to the Helder, fifty-one miles. The Caledonia Canal, in Scotland, has a total length of sixty miles, including three lakes. The Suez Canal is eighty-eight miles long, of which sixty-six miles are actual canal. The Erie Canal is 350½ miles long; the Ohio Canal, Cleveland to Portsmouth, 332; the Miami & Erie, Cincinnati to Toledo, 291; the Wabash & Erie, Evansville to the Ohio line, 374.

Wanted Information.

"Man does not conceive the magnitude of a billion," remarked the lecturer; "why, a billion sheets of paper placed one on top of another would make a pile nearly 50,000 miles high."

At this juncture a very solemn looking party with a large Adam's apple, rose up from the back seat and said: "Yes, but how are you going to pile them up?"

And because the lecturer wouldn't explain the solemn party sailed majestically out of the hall, thumping his cane angrily all the way.

Call a Spade a Spade.

Wrong-doers are always glad to designate their evil courses by some other words than the simple and direct ones which make their villainy apparent. Right-doers ought, however, to insist on right names for wrong doings. In this line the Hartford Courant says pithily: "Over certification" and "re-hypothecation" are pretty long words. One means lying, and the other means stealing. When we are told that the recent troubles in business in New York are attributable to these long-sounding causes, we are really told that lying and stealing are at the bottom of the difficulty." There is often a gain to the cause of truth by speaking of a man plainly as a "thief," instead of calling him by the smoother title of a "defaulter."

...Two men could be in greater contrast than the two Peels in the House of Commons, the Speaker and Sir Robert. The one appears sombre, pedantic, a model of propriety and decorum, while the other has the air of a Bowery tragedian, who had lived fast and furious, and with a mind so vagabond as to be beyond all rules of restraint. The other day his brother pulled him up, as being out of order, when he turned on him scarlet with rage at a rebuke from a younger brother, and looking fierce defiance, in a voice broken with passion, said: "I know what I am about." He then deliberately repeated the offence. The younger brother did not prolong the scene.

M. Bertillion has recently published some statistics of divorce which are interesting in connection with the debates in the French Chamber. The countries in which divorces and separations de corps are most rare are Scotland, Russia, and Italy. In these three countries the number of divorces varies from one to five per thousand marriages. In the United States the proportion is twenty-eight in every thousand marriages. The conjugal tie proves most irksome in Saxony, and indeed, M Bertillion observes that there is a much larger proportion of divorces among Teutonic than among Latin nations. Even in the German cantons of Switzerland divorces are more frequent than in the others. The great army of the divorced and separated is composed in very large proportion of brain workers and members of the liberal professions. M. Bertillion's figures show that in nine cases out of ten it is the woman who desires the divorce, and that the great er the disparity in the relative ages of the parties the more frequent are the divorces Thus, where the wife is from ten to five and twenty years older than her husband, there are 480 divorces per 100,000.

ABORIGINAL RACE.

What A History of Arizona Would Unfold.

Arizona has a history which never has been written and which never will be until the mythology of the races living here is known, or until there is discovered a knowledge of the past ages which was so well hid 300 years ago that even the Spaniards visiting Arizona then could not obtain possession of it with all their power of forcing secret out of the people whom they conquered. Who the first inhabitants were of this far southern territory, whence they came and whither they went may, perhaps, never be known. Certainly, none to-day can tell us. The past is a secret buried beneath the ages; a mystery that puzzles the learned as well as the ignorant. And yet, that the country has a history is unquestioned. There are evidences everywhere that in prehistoric times Arizona was a popular region, teeming with human activity. Long before America was thought of, before, perhaps, Athens was a reality, before the deluge, Arizona was inhabited by a race of people who have left to us only their history as it is written in their empty canals which they dug, the ruined houses which they built, the valleys which they cultivated, and in the inscribed rocks and pieces of broken pottery which are found scattered over the territory. Ages before the European saw this continent two races had lived and died in Arizona, and the existing evidences of their occupancy form one of the many attractions which the territory has to offer. Near Cosnino, on the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad for instance, there is to be seen a canon, 2,000 feet deep which is 100 yards wide at the bottom and 300 at the top. Along its walls there are great ledges of rock, which project outward from ten to twenty feet, and upon which may be traced seven tiers of cliff dwellings. From the bottom of the lowest tier to that of the canon the distance is 200 feet, the depth apparently having formed by the action of water since the houses were built and occupied. The fronts of the dwellings and the side walls are of solid masonry, and are still well preserved. How many centuries have come and gone since these cliffs were occupied no one can tell. Thousands of years at least must have possed between the ege in which the cliff-dwellings were made and that of the advent of the European. Still another race had occupied Arizona, the people of which built the canals which are now seen in ruins about the country and who irrigated the valley now so dry and parched. Perhaps the most extensive of these ruins are those seen near the station of Casa Grande on the Southern Pacific railroad, a short distance northwest of Tucson. Leaving the road at that station and driving or riding northward a few miles one crosses into the famous Gila river valley and to a crumbling and time-stained collection of mounds of sand and stone which are the remnants of that Casa Grande, or great house which was first discovered by the Spaniard, more than 350 years ego. When first found the largest building was four stories high and had walls six feet in thickness

A hundred years ago one house still remained, which was 420 by 260 feet in size. The ruin is now but 50 by 30 feet and will soon be simply a shapeless mound. The walls are concrete, made of mud and gravel, held together by a hard cement, and the inner surface coated with cement is hard and smooth. Not far from Casa Grande there is an irrigating canal which has been followed for forty miles toward the Gila river, and which must at some time have watered an immense tract of land which, until very lately has been deemed absolutely worthless.

"Truth" Bible Competition.

NO. ELEVEN.

THE FINAL ONE.

Closing September 15th.

A NEW PLAN.

For Persons Residing Anywhere in the World Outside the City of Toronto.

The Largest List, and Most Valuable Ever Offered by Any Publisher.

Residents of Toronto Inadmissable.

A SMALL FARM FREE.

Special Club Offer.

Four Pianos, Three Organs, Silver Tea Sets, Sewing Machines, Gold Watches, Silver Watches, and Innumerable Other Valuable Rewards.

Don't Delay Sending in Your Answers.

At the solicitation of many friends TRUTH announces one more—the final—Bible competition. Owing to the fact of so many valuable rewards going to citizens of Toronto, this competition will be open only to persons living outside the city of Toronto. Any one residing in any other part of the habitable world will be eligible to compete for these magnificent rewards. The questions—which are supplied by an eminent Presbyterian minister—are very difficult, but the rewards are valuable. Everything offered in previous competitions has been promptly and cheerfully handed over to the successful ones the moment they are known. Full and complete lists of all those who gain rewards are given in TRUTH the week following the close of each competition. There will be no change, and no postponement in any way; everything will be carried out exactly as stated.

HERE ARE THE QUESTIONS.

1.—Where is GOLD first made mention of in the Bible?

2.—Where does it first state in the Bible that there was ONLY ONE LANGUAGE AND ONE SPEECH on the whole earth?

3.—Where is INN first referred to in the Bible? (By the word inn is meant a place of rest and refreshment commonly known now as an hotel.)

Every one competing must send one dollar with their answers, for six months' subscription to TRUTH. And aside from the rewards, themselves, they will find that they have made the best investment of one dollar they ever did. TRUTH is full and big value for the money. Bear in mind that you pay nothing extra for the privilege of competing for these costly rewards, and you will get TRUTH for six months in any case for your one dollar, which is the regular subscription price, and will also get one of these rewards, provided your answers are correct, and reach TRUTH office in time Don't delay.

Of course, each of the club will have the same opportunity of gaining one of the rewards in the regular list (in addition to the certainity of one of the prizes for club), as though they had sent in singly. This is simply an extra inducement to clubs.

The rewards in last competition were very widely scattered over Ontario and Quebec. In fact, every province was represented in the last, not excepting British Columbia. A great many also went to the States.

No information will be given any one beyond what has above been stated. So don't waste time by waiting, but send in your answers and money now. If you happen to be too late for the first, you may be fortunate enough to obtain a middle reward, and that is where the biggest ones are. TRUTH directs special attention to the fact that clergymen are not permitted to compete, neither are persons who in previous competitions won prizes exceeding one hundred dollars in value, and as no Torontonians are allowed to compete, the field is now open for a fair and square race for these rewards to any one, on the habitable globe, outside Toronto. No money will be received by telegraph, or in any way but through the postoffice or by express. One dollar only required. Try your skill. You are sure of good value for your money anyway. Address S Frank Wilson, TRUTH Office, 33 and 35 Adelaide street, Toronto, Canada.

SAW MILL AND TIMBER LAND FOR SALE OR TO LET

In the Township of Artemesia, County of Grey, 4 miles from Flesherton Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The mill is situated at Little Falls, in a block of about 400 acres timber and, with other timber land surrounding. The building is substantially built on stone foundation. The machinery is all good and driven with great power by a 23 inch Leffell wheel, under 36 ft. head of water. There are one large circular saw for cutting logs, 2 small circulars for sawing lath and broom handles, 1 guage lathe for turning broom handles, etc., 1 shingle machine with jointer and packer complete. The water power is excellent, the stream being very regular. There are several other good mill sites on the proyerty. The land in valley is considered the best in the country. The place would make an excellent stock farm when the timber is taken off.

This offers a good opportunity for a practical, energetic man to go into this kind of business, as the place will be sold or let on liberal terms.

The bush is so convenient to the mill logs can be trucked in summer time. Immediate possession given.

A Chesley woman chased her husband a mile and a half with a club for winking at the hired girl, and he only escaped her by climbing a telegraph pole. At latest advices she was sitting at the foot of the pole waiting for the crowd to leave so that she could go up and see him.—Bruce Herald.

A SUDDEN ATTACK.

All people, and especially travellers, are liable to a sudden attack of Cholera Morbus, Colic, Diarrhœa and Dysentery. Dr. Fowler's Wild Strawberry is the most prompt and reliable remedy known.

Mr. John T. Middlemore, the founder of the Orphan Children's Emigration Charity, London, Ont., left Liverpool on the 12th inst in the S. S. Parisian with a party of 50 girls and 100 boys between the ages of 5 and 15 years, who are brought out to this country for adoption or hire, chiefly among farmers. They are expected to arrive at the Guthrie Home, near the city, on or about the 25th inst. This will be Mr. Middlemore's 12th annual visit to these shores with juvenile emigrants from Birmingham, England, since 1872. Already many applications accompanied with good references have been made for the Children expected to arrive but more are required. Further particulars may be obtained by addressing Mr. H. Gibbens, Manager of the Guthrie Home, London, Ont.

A STARTLING DISCOVERY.

Physicians are often startled by remarkable discoveries. The fact that Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption and all Throat and Lung diseases is daily curing patients that they have given up to die, is startling them to realize their sense of duty, and examine into the merits of this wonderful discovery; resulting in hundreds of our best Physicians using it in their practice. Trial bottles free at A. Turner, & Co's. Drug Store. Regular Size $1.00. 4

Grange Excursion.

The Grangers' excursion to the city of Guelph and Model Farm, on Thursday last, was a complete success. 74 tickets were bought at Meaford station, 28 at Thornbury, and a large number boarded the train at other stations on the route. Those who went from Meaford express themselves pleased with the trip and their reception in the Royal city and at the Model Farm. The train arrived at Meaford on the return trip about 12 p. m.—Meaford Mirror.

THESE ARE SOLID FACTS.

The best blood purifier and system regulator ever placed within the reach of suffering humanity, truly the Electric Bitters. Sitting Up and Sitting Down.

Inquiring child—"Pa, what is the difference between sitting up and sitting down?" Pa, with perfect confidence in his ability to explain—"Why, my child, when somebody is standing up and seats himself, he sits down; and when he doesn't go to bed and sits down, he sits up." Inquiring child—"But, pa, if he sits, how can he sit without sitting down; and if he sits down, how can he sit up?" Pa, with a dawning doubt of his ability to make it quite clear—"You see, my child, if he sits down, why he—; I mean if he sits up—Go to your ma, and don't ask me questions when I'm busy."

TO THE LADIES.

McGregor & Parke's Carbolic Cerate wil cure any case of Pimples on the face or Rough Skin on either hands or face and leave them soft as silk. It will also heal any sore when all other preparations fail. Thousands have tested it. Ask your druggist for McGregor and Parke's Carbolic Cerate, and do not be persuaded to take anything else claimed to be as good. It is but 25 cents per box at Hill Bro's, J. & J. 8

Good Business Rules.

Business men, especially those who are thorough, prompt, and methodical, are guided by certain elementary principles. In some case these principles are formulated into simple rules which cover even the details of conduct. A prominent New York banker attributes his success in business to the care with which he has obeyed these plain rules:—

Take time for eating, sleeping and digestion. Don't worry. Be satisfied with your work, after doing it well.

Never ask another to do what you ought to attend to personally.

Shun the slightest appearance of dishonesty as you would shun the plague.

Always meet your appointments on time. Never late. If possible, not much ahead of the moment.

Don't talk too much. Let your actions speak for yourself.

Be honest, even if you lose money by it.

Never let business interfere with home duties.

Remember that money alone cannot buy peace, nor true friends, nor a loving family.

It is refreshing, in these days of speculation and dishonest dealings, to know that a man can live according to the above principles and yet make money. It shows that honesty and business can go hand in hand.

BUCKLEN'S ARNICA SALVE.

The best Salve in the world for cuts, bruises sores, ulcers, salt rheum, fever sores, tetter, chapped hands, chilblains, corns, and all skin eruptions, and positively cures piles or no pay required. It is guaranteed to give perfect satisfaction, or money refunded. Price 25 cents per box. For Sale by A. Turner & Co.

Bears.

Seldom in the history of the past 20 years has the damage done by bears ever been so serious as the present season through the Country generally, and in fact naturally leads one to consider, what means could be adopted towards the extermination of this species of wild animal. We believe the various township Councils should offer a reward for the capture of every bear old or young and have no doubt as to the results being a slaughter on the, now most numerous enemy, in the shape of wild beasts in our county.

WHAT TO DO.

If troubled with an unhealthy, slow-heating sore use McGregor & Parkes' Carbolic Cerate. You will find it invaluable for healing, cleansing and completely removing your trouble. If the Blood is out of order, take with it a few doses of McGregor's Speedy Cure from Hill Bros. J. & J. 1

How different things turn out from what we expected. When railways were first introduced it was confidently expected that the demand of horses and waggons would fall off most seriously, but it turned out that more were required than ever before. A Boston paper says:—"Singular as it may seem the telephone has been the best friend of the telegraph. Just as the elevated railroads in New York increased street travel, and made horse railroads more profitable; just as the use of the telegraph increases the postal revenues, so the telephone has educated the whole country to a more liberal use of all methods of quick communication, and largely increased the telegraph revenues." It is just so, too, that the art of printing increased largely the demand for penmen, and the newspapers increased the talk of the gossipers.

A GOOD TIME.

When is the best time to take a blood purifier? Whenever the blood is foul and humors appear, or when the system is debilited take Burdock Blood Bitters.

REMARKABLE RESTORATION.

Mrs. Adelaide O'Brien, of Buffalo, N. Y., was given up to die by her physicians, as incurable with consumption. It proved Liver Complaint and was cured with Burdock Blood Bitters.

A FIRM OPINION.

The firm of Ormand & Walsh, druggists, of Peterboro, say Dr. Fowler's Wild Strawberry is one of their best Standard Medicines for Summer Complaints.

WEDNESDAY.

THE Warden read several communications and accounts, which were referred to the respected committees.

Mr. McKechnie presented report of the Finance Committee, recommending a further payment of $30 for the arrest and conviction of a horse thief; also recommending that while satisfied with the manner in which the Assistant Clerk preforms the duties the resignation of G. J. Gale as Clerk be not accepted. On motion of Messrs. Rogers and Gamey, the report was adopted.

Mr. McKechnie introduced By-law 324, to repeal By-law 140 respecting horse thieves, which was read first and second times.

Mr. V. Lang moved, seconded by Mr. Messenger, that a committee be appointed to revise and consolidate the By Laws now in force in this county, the committee to consist of Messrs Frost, Christoe, Middleton, McKechnie, and the mover. This was lost, and the Council then passed By-Law through committee of the whole.

THURSDAY.

The Warden read report of School Inspector for West Grey.

Mr. McKechnie presented Report No. 3 of Finance Committee, recommending a grant of $250 each of the three Riding Agricultural Societies, to be distributed on the same basis as the Government grants.

Messrs. Davis and Norton moved the adoption of the report, Messrs Campbell and Read moved in amendment that the Council go into committee of the whole. The amendment was lost, and report adopted.

Mr. Christoe presented report of County Property Committee, recommending the payment of several accounts also recommending that the committee be authorized to obtain information as to the cost of erecting a suitable building for offices for the County Judge and other officials, the present accommodation being altogether inadequate. The report was adopted.

Mr. V. Lang presented report of Printing Committee, recommending payment of several accounts, which was adopted.

After some spent in committee, on By-law 324 respecting horse thieves, the By-law was read a third time and passed. It offers a reward of $50 in each case of the apprehension of a person guilty of horse stealing in the county.

FRIDAY.

Mr. Hewgill presented report of Education Committee. It recommended that a committee be appointed on the re-adjustment of sections in Proton as petitioned for, and that Arch. McIntyre be appointed to act; but that the Council had no jurisdiction in the case of Union Section of Normanby and Egremont, with respect to which petition had been received. It also recommended that the petition of Peel County Council, with respect to changes in school law, be adopted with some modifications. The report was adopted.

Mr. Davis, Reeve of Glenelg, asked for information as to whether the County or Township Councils have jurisdiction over deviations since the gravel roads were abandoned by the county. He said there were difficulties about fences on these deviations, and he did not know who had authority to compell their removal.

Mr. Hewgill introduced By-law to assess the different municipalities for an equivalent to the Legislative School grants.

Mr. Chisholm moved, seconded by Mr. Davis, that the gravel roads be resumed by the County and a By-law to that effect be prepared.

Yeas—Christoe, Peddar, McNicol, Messenger, McCallum, Robertson, Brien, Davis, McMillan, Norton, W. Lang, Gordon, Heming, Chisholm, Frost, Miller, Thomston, McKechnie—10.

Nays—McKenny, Campbell, Hewgill, Gilray, Fawcett, V. Lang, Caulfield, Paul, Totten, Clark, O'Farrell, Widmeyer, Gamey, Middlton, Rogers, Dunnington, Vasey, Bowes, Read McNaught—20.

Mr. McKechnie presented the report of Finance Committee as to equalization of assessments. The report adopted the valuator's assessment as to real estate adding 10 per cent. to township, and 25 per cent. to towns for personal property.

Mr. McKechnie introduced By-law to levy a rate of 7-10th cts mill for county purpose, which would aggregate $19,803.

The Council then went into committe of the whole on the report of Finance Committee, Mr. McKenny in the chair.

Moved by Mr. Middleton, seconded by Mr. McNicol, that the valuator's report be varied by changing the values of land in the undermentioned townships as follows:

	1st class.	2nd.	3rd.	4th.
Artemesia	$35	$25	$14	$6
Bentinck	32	25	11	6
Glenelg	30	26	11	5
Holland	33	20	12	5
Keppel	30	18	12	3
Osprey	30	20	12	6
and 2,000 acres at $1.
Proton	28	20	10	4
Sarawak	35	24	12	6

That Brooke be reduced to $65,000, and Durham to $630,000; and that the personal properties of Owen Sound, Meaford and Durham be computed at 15 per cent. addition to their real estate valuation.

Moved in amendment by Mr. Chisholm, seconded by Mr. Bowes, that the personal property assessment of 10 per cent. be not levied on Keppel and Sarawak, and the personal property of towns be computed at 15 per cent.

Mr. McNicol said he saw no reason why Keppel and Sarawak should be relieved of assessment for personal property, although he thought the personal in towns should be reduced.

Mr. Gordon said that when the valuators were appointed they received great praise, and were considered just the men for the position. We began to hear in December that they were not infallible, and now they were worse still. He quoted the statute and read from Harrison's mannel to show that the Council could not alter the valuators report. Even if they had the power to alter, how could they value townships of which many of them had no knowledge, and set up their opinion against that of men who had gone through the township for the purpose and were sworn to do their duty.

The County Solicitor's opinion being asked, he said the words of the statute were not quite clear; but he thought while errors might be corrected, or a manifest increase during the time might be taken into account they would not materially alter the report.

Mr. Frost was not sure but the Council had power to modify the valuators' report, but if they commenced they would never stop. He thought the only proper course was to stand by the report, and if any township felt aggrieved, let them appeal. As to personal property, he thought the towns had no more personal in proportion to their real estate than townships, and quoted figures to show that the Sullivan assessor had made the personal of the township more than was assessed in Owen Sound. He moved in amendment, That it is not desirable to make any change in valuators' report, and that a uniform rate of 10 per cent. on real property be made as an equalization for personal property.

Mr. Clark said he had been figuring on Mr. Middleton's amendment, and Keppel would be worse than before. There was some reduction made, but the other reductions made their proportion greater than before.

Mr. Middleton said there was a mistake in the resolution as to Keppel, and corrected it by making third-class land $8 per acre. He was willing to do justice to the towns by reducing personal to 15 per cent., but the representatives of the towns wanted to take that and prevent other municipalities getting justice. As to Keppel and Sarawak, no reason had been given for exceptional treatment as to personal property. He took a broad view, and would do justice to all around.

Mr. McKechnie contended that the equalization of personal property was unjust to the towns, and asked why Durham, with a population of 1000, should be taxed 25 per cent., while Dundalk, with 700 of a population, got off with 10 per cent.? He pointed out that there was $1,188,158 village property included in the townships.

Dr. Christoe said it was not the Reeves of Artemesia, Proton or Osprey, who were opposed to the report, but the whole people the of these townships. He saw no reason why they should not depart from report, if we believed it to be wrong. It had never been assumed that the former valuation could not be altered, and it was altered. There had always before been an inclination to meet each other's views, and he hoped they would still deal justly. As to personal he did not think there should be much difference between townships and towns.

Mr. Read said if they did not accept the valuators' report it was quite evident the members of the Council were not in a position to amend it as they had not the requisite knowledge of the localities. The only thing they could do would be to appoint new valuators, and where could they get better men? He had proposed to get outside professional valuators, but the Council would not hear of it. Although opposed to the appointment of these valuators, he was willing to accept their report; and it was strange that the very men who supported the appointment of the valuators now wanted to reject their report.

Messrs. Hewgill, Fawcett, Bowes and Dunnington spoke in favor of standing by the report of the valuators, and thought there should not be much difference in personal between towns and townships.

Messrs. Clark, McNichol, Middleton, and Cameron, again spoke against the report, the two latter giving instances of blunders in it.

The motion to stand by the report of the valuators, but make personal in townships and towns a uniform rate of 10 per cent. on real estate was then carried by 20 to 19, and the committee rose and Council adjourned.

SATURDAY MORNING.

On motion of Mr. Campbell, By-law 325, to levy school equivalent, was read a third time.

Mr. Frost moved, seconded by Mr. Read, that report of Finance Committee be adopted.

Moved in amendment by Mr. Totten, seconded by Mr. McNaught, that the 10 per cent. added for personal property in Keppel and Sarawak be struck off.

Dr. Christoe said he felt like relieving Keppel and Sarawak, but he did not like to do it in this way. He would give a direct money grant.

Mr. Middleton moved in amendment, seconded by Mr McNichol, that the report be referred back to alter the basis of equalization in the valuators' report, as follows:—

	1st class	2nd.	3rd.	4th.
Artemesia	$35	25	16	6
Bentick	33	25	11	6
Egremont	38	26	13	6
Glenelg	33	22	14	5
Holland	33	20	15	5
Keppel	32	20	9	3
Osprey	32	22	12	5
and 2,000 acres at $1.
Proton	30	20	10	4
Sarawak	35	24	12	6
and $16,328 of Brooke.

And that $16,000 be taken off Durham and $10,000 off Meaford on account of fires and the township of Sullivan be reduced $1 per acre over the whole township.

Mr Chisholm said the mover of the resolution had a fertile imanigation. He thought yesterday to catch a few municipalities by holding ont baits to them, and now he hoped to rope in a few more, but the most of these municipalities no inducement at all, for the amount taken of a few would keep up their proportion of county rate.

Mr. Middleton indignantly denied that he was seeking exceptional advantage for Proton and went over the figures to show that what he was proposing was fair.

Mr. McKenny said he opposed tampering with the report, on the ground that councillors were incapable of properly equalizing without a knowledge of the whole county; but if the valuation was to be altered, he claimed the right that the representatives of each township should be heard as to their claim to reduction.

Mr Gordon read some figures from the Agricultural Commission, showing the crops raised in the different townships; but Mr. McNichol said these figures were not worth a straw.

Mr. McIntyre claimed that there was great injustice to some townships; while Mr. Clark pointed to a large quantity of unoccupied land in Keppel to prove that it would be unfair to put that township on the same footing as others as to personal property.

Mr. Dunnington said Mr. Middleton was getting new light. Yesterday neither Meaford, Egremont nor Sullivan were suffering, but now they were to have relief. He was opposed to his principle of taking in just enough to carry the point.

After some further remarks by Dr. Christoe and Mr. Read, Mr. Middleton's motion was lost by the following vote:—

Yeas—Christoe, Peddler, McNichol, Messenger, Davis, McMillan, Norton Gamey, McIntyre, Middleton, Rogers, McKechnie.

Nays—McCallum, McKenny, Campbell, Hewgill, Robertson, Brien, Gilray, Fawcett, Caulfield, Paul, Totten, Clark, V. Lang, O'Farrell, Widmeyer, Dunnington, Vasey, Bowes, Read, W. Lang, Gordon, Heming, McNaught, Chisholm, Frost, Miller Thompson—27.

Moved by Mr. Middleton, seconded by Mr. Rogers, that rural municipalities be assessed at 10 per cent. for personal property, and towns 15 per cent.; and that $18,000 be taken from assessment of Durham, and $10,000 from Meaford, on account of fires—Lost by 6 to 33.

Messrs. Totten and McNaught withdrew their amendment on the assurance that the cases of Keppel and Sarawak would be considered by a direct money vote: and the report of Finance Committee, as amended the previous evening, was then adopted.

The Council agreed in case of appeal to have the final equalization made by the County Judge.

By-laws levying the county rate, and also the rate for railway by-law, were then passed.

Messrs. Gilray and Fawcett, moved to correct an error in valuator's report in connection with Euphrasia, amounting to $2,000—Lost.

Mr. Chisholm moved to make a grant of $150 to Keppel and $100 to Sarawak, to be deducted from their county rate, but as the rules did not permit such motion without notice, it was deferred till December session.

Mr. McKenny moved to memorialize the Ontario Government of aid to encourage the building of wire fences to prevent drifting along public highways—lost.

Mr. Middleton moved that a memorial be prepared and entrusted to Dr. Sproule M. P. asking the Dominion Government to refund the amount the municipalities have given to railways in the county, as they have been assumed by the Dominion, which was carried by acclamation amidst laughter.

The Council adjourned till Tuesday, Dec. 16, at 7 p. m.

FATAL BOILER EXPLOSION.—The boiler in Rogers' saw-mill, three miles east of Tara, exploded at eleven o'clock this forenoon, July 4th. The building was entirely demolished, not a stick or board being left standing. The engineer, a young man named Wm. Walker, was killed, and D. Bennett and another workman seriously injured The cause of the explosion is unknown. The young man Walker was a stranger here, and the whereabouts of his friends is not known, but he is believed to have belonged near Toronto.

His Uncle's Heir.

CHAPTER III.

"Anita, this is my nephew, Frank de Walden."

A slender figure rose from the pile of cushions in the centre of the great flower-filled room, a shapely hand was extended, with a sort of timid graciousness, and Frank found himself confronting the most beautiful girl he had ever seen.

Yes—even with Esther Verner's lovely face freshly present to his lover fancy, he owned that at once as he gazed with a thrill of admiring wonder upon the girl who had ruined all his hopes and perhaps blighted his life. His first sensation was one of intense surprise, for, when his uncle spoke of his wife an Italian, he had promptly imagined a handsome girl of the dusky, flashing-eyed, and raven-haired type; but here he gazed upon a radiant fairness that almost dazzled him, on a face that was almost angelic in its gentle purity.

She was above the ordinary height of women, and looked taller still in her long straight dress of creamy white, with features delicately straight and large serious eyes of a real violet hue. She had twisted closely about her small noble head a mass of golden hair that waved and glittered and seemed from every silken tendril to reflect the light; her mouth was small and beautifully curved, with the downward droop that gave it in repose a rather sorrowful look; but when, as now, she smiled, its expression was wonderfully sweet.

"My nephew then, is it not?" she said, with her pretty foreign intonation and an appealing upward glance; and, though the smarting sting of his cruel disappointment of course remained, Frank felt all bitterness die then and there out of his thoughts.

"Your nephew, certainly," he said heartily, "and, I hope, always your true and faithful friend.

"Thank you, my boy!" Sir George's voice was a little husky, and the hand that rested on Frank's shoulder was hardly so steady as it might have been, but the glance his uncle gave him almost repaid the young man for the effort he had made.

Fortunately the summons to dinner put an end to the embarrassing interview, and, despite his troubles and perplexities, Frank found himself enjoying a really agreeable meal. Both Sir George and his young wife felt that they owed something to the young man who had borne his ill-fortune with so gallant a grace, and both exerted themselves to the uttermost to do him honor, and make him, for a time at least, forget.

So things went on pleasantly enough until, just as the dessert was placed upon the table and the servants were preparing to withdraw, Sir George met his wife's eyes, and turned to the young man with rather a nervous smile.

"Another introduction for you, Frank. We always have Master Georgie in at this time."

"I am glad to hear it, for I am anxious to make my young cousin's acquaintance," Frank answered promptly; and, as he spoke, the door opened, and the "young cousin" came into the room.

"Come here, George," said his father; the child ran over to Lady de Walden's side, and, resting his fair curly head against her shoulder, stood watching the stranger with big blue eyes that were at once shy and bold.

"Georgie is not used to seeing people," Anita said apologetically, and Frank smiled and held out both hands as he answered, in a tone of easy confidence—

"But Georgie will come to me."

The child looked doubtfully from under his soft fair curls, but the doubt lasted for a second only; then he ran over frankly to the stranger's side, lifted his cherub face for the stranger's kiss, and, a minute or so later, had climbed upon the stranger's knee, and, with a plate of fruit before him, was chattering away in his broken baby fashion as though to an old friend.

Sir George looked radiantly across at the pair, and, returning his smile, Frank really forgot that he had any trouble on his mind. He was not surprised as the others were; he had a real love for and sympathy with children, and knew that in turn he possessed a magnetic attraction for them; but this last conquest pleased him in a special fashion.

"He is a noble little fellow," Frank said cordially, and almost without an effort, when, leading her small son by the hand, Lady de Walden had left the room, and the two men were alone. "A true De Walden, though he has all his mother's beauty."

"You think her beautiful then?"

Frank smiled.

"As to that there can be no two opinions. Her face is perfect, and she is as charming in manner as in face."

Sir George was more than pleased with the words; but he made no immediate comment upon them, only nodded his gray head once or twice, and sipped his claret in a meditative fashion, while Frank stared out into the moonlit splendour of the night with eyes that were full of troubled thought, and saw nothing of what they gazed upon so intently.

The first keen pang was past; there was very little bitterness in his heart now; but a growing terror had taken its place. That the cruel change in his prospects would make any change in Essie he never for a moment thought. But what would Mr. Verner say? Frank shivered as he imagined the man's cold gray eyes and resolute lips when he should hear that his future son-in-law was a poor and prospectless man.

"Frank"—Sir George cleared his throat with a nervous effort, and drew his chair a little nearer to the table—"you have behaved very generously, my dear boy; and, though I cannot thank you now, I shall not forget this day's work. I wish to Heaven I had found the courage to tell you two or three years ago!"

How fervently Frank echoed that wish! How much pain that courage would have spared him! But he only smiled, and his uncle went on, in the same embarrassed fashion—

"Of course, you think me an old fool—don't take the trouble to deny that, my good fellow; but you don't yet know what Anita is, or how our marriage came about. Have you patience to hear the story?"

Frank was too kind-hearted to say what was the truth, that his head was still confused and dizzy, and that he could but imperfectly follow the details of any story told to him that night: so he merely murmured a vague assent, and Sir George, who held his head in the palm of his hand and meditatively stroked the pendent ends of his long gray moustache, was quite content with this encouragement.

"Her father was a doctor, a dreamy, bookish old fellow, who lived in a little fishing-village where I had the good fortune to be laid up with a smart attack of the local fever and ague. I do not think I was ever in any real danger, or that old Salviati treated me with any special skill; but I do know that his daughter nursed me with the most absolute devotion and tender care, and that, when I saw that sweet serious face, with its look of angelic pity, through the feverish mists that hung about me, I thought the Madonna in the old village church had stepped down from her century-old frame to soothe and comfort and heal me.

"Well, the delirious fancy passed as the fever abated, and my reason came back. I knew that Anita Salviati was neither saint nor angel, only a good and beautiful girl to whom even more than to her father I owed perhaps my life. But I knew much more than this, and the knowledge filled me with such scorn for myself as I am sure you cannot feel for me, Frank. I knew that I, who had cared nothing for women in the springtime of my life, who had shunned them in my maturity, and had as little thought of ever marrying as of ever being hanged, had now in my sober age fallen head over ears in love with this beautiful Italian child.

"Why do you not laugh, Frank? I laughed myself, I can tell you, and, calling my pride and sense of the ridiculous to my aid, strenuously combated the idea of yielding to such an infatuated fancy. And I really think I should have conquered, and left the place with my secret still untold—left Anita to think of me only as a old gentleman deeply grateful for her care, but that fate itself declared against me and forced me to yield.

"One evening I found Anita sobbing wildly in the little hillside garden, and, though I entreated her to tell me the cause of her grief, she refused with a vehemence very foreign to her gentle nature, and darted into the house. As she did so, I chanced to look back and saw a fine-looking young man descending the precipitous path between the olive-trees with reckless haste. As he reached the curve of the road, he turned to glare vengefully back at the house, and I saw that his handsome Southern face was distorted with rage.

"The sight impressed me disagreeably. I knew the childish excitability of the people among whom I dwelt, knew how slight a cause might send such a man as this into a foaming frenzy of indignation that might as quickly pass away; but there had been something murderous in that threatening look. I could not shake off the remembrance, try as I would.

"Moreover, who could that familiar, if unfriendly, visitor be? Had I interrupted a lovers' quarrel? If so, then Anita had a lover—was perhaps betrothed; the thought stung me as sharply as the cut of a whip. I resolved to know the worst, and laid the whole puzzle and perplexity of my thoughts before Doctor Salviati that night.

"He listened anxiously and with a darkening brow to my story of the evening's scene, and interrupted me once or twice with an angry exclamation; but he sighed wearily when my tale was done, and paced the narrow little room with a pitifully helpless look.

"'It was her cousin Giuseppe, without doubt,' he muttered uneasily. 'And my poor Anita will never complain!'

"'Because her cousin is also her lover?' I asked, with a coolness that surprised myself; and I am sure Salviati never guessed how wildly my heart was beating.'

"'No, indeed!' he said angrily. 'The lad is hard and cruel and wicked, and in her gentle heart my child detests and fears him; but he is her only relative, her mother's sister's child, and she cannot bear to break with him wholly.'

"'They are not betrothed then?'

"'The saints forbid!' the old man answered, with a shudder. 'I would rather see Anita in her grave than in Giuseppe Lani's power, though in his mad fashion he worships her, and he has solemnly sworn, they tell me, that sooner or later she shall be his wife. Heaven help my child when I am no longer here to protect her! There will be but one refuge for her then.

"'And that is——'

"'The convent. She has but a slender portion to bring with her; but the holy mother and the good nuns have known Anita from her babyhood, and love her well; they will take her, I know.'

"I shivered at the sorrowful determination of his tone. There was something terrible in the calmness with which he devoted his beautiful child to the living death of conventual life.

"'And can you bear to think of Anita as a nun, a pale ghostly creature gliding like a shadow through the world to which she is united by no human ties?' I cried, trying to keep every sign of indignation down, but with only indifferent success, I suppose, for Salviati eyed me with more attention as he answered gravely—

"'Is it not better to give her to Heaven than to Giuseppe Lani? And I have no other choice.'

"'You have,' I said, the truth that I had sworn to hide for ever forced to my lips at last. 'You can give her to me.'

"'To you,' he echoed confusedly—'to you! You are jesting, signor, or——'

"'I am speaking plain and simple truth. I love your daughter, as well perhaps as any younger man could love her, and can give her at least as much as the convent has to offer. I know every objection you can make; I am old, and so unlikely to win the love of a beautiful young girl that I do not even ask it; I ask only to be allowed to make her happy, to rescue her from her cousin and the living tomb of a nun.'

"Well, I may cut my story short, Frank. Salviati was not hard to convince. Perhaps my money dazzled him, for he was very, very poor; but he was a simple-hearted affectionate-natured man, broken in health and oppressed with the one great dread that he might be taken away, and his daughter left without a friend or protector in the world. It is no wonder that the safe shelter I offered proved an irresistible temptation, or that he spared no pains to bring Anita to his views.

"He did all the love-making, and I was well content that it should be so. I had no wish to make myself either hateful or ridiculous in the girl's eyes; and, playing the lover's part at my age, I must needs have seemed either one or the other. What arguments he used I cannot say; but they were successful; and, when he laid Anita's hand in mine, I saw, with a thrill of pleasure, that there was neither fear nor repugnance in the beautiful girl-face, that the shy sweet eyes upraised themselves to mine with an innocent childish trust.

"'Make her happy, signor,' poor old Salviati said below his breath.

"I promised with grateful fervour that I would, and I think, Heaven helping me, that I have kept my word."

Sir George paused and sipped his wine thoughtfully, and Frank watched him with a curious smile, half sympathetic, half amused. It was so strange to think of his old uncle being in love, to listen to the story of those ante-diluvian hopes and fears, that he half forgot how deeply it concerned himself. Then suddenly, with a sharp sting of pain, memory woke, and he asked abruptly—

"But why did you not announce your marriage, sir, having so little reason to hide it?"

"No reason at all," Sir George answered, twisting his gray moustache a little ruefully; "only December's usual craven fear of looking absurd beside his blooming May; but I can hardly tell you how things drifted on. First I wished Anita to learn to speak English before I brought her to her English home; then came Salviati's illness and death, to say nothing of the birth of our boy."

"That surely should have hastened the declaration," poor Frank said, a little bitterly, recalling with a fresh twinge of pain all that that foolish unnecessary mystery meant to him.

Sir George laid his hand upon the young man's shoulder with a kindly and entreating pressure.

"Be wholly generous, Frank," he said almost wistfully. "I know I have acted like a fool and a coward; but do not tell me so very plainly that you share that knowledge."

Frank laughed, and answered lightly—

"You twist my words, sir; but finish your story. Signor Salviati is dead, you and Lady de Walden are happy—I want all the characters disposed of. What became of Giuseppe Lani?"

Sir George smiled, and shook his gray head.

"He was rather a shadowy character, Frank. I never saw him but that once. It seems he went to sea that night, and whether he was drowned or so disgusted with the place that he did not choose to return nobody knows; the only certain thing is that Porto Rico saw him no more. I am sure that for the first few months of our marriage Anita lived in a constant terror that her father fully shared; but of course that died out at last. I do not suppose that any one in the village regretted the young desperado much; I am quite sure I did not. But enough of him. Let us talk of your prospects now."

Frank's face flushed; and he drew his chair back into the shadow, unwilling that his uncle should see all the pain and trouble it revealed.

"I think the best thing, in the circumstances, will be for me to see Mr. Verner and tell him exactly how matters stand," Sir George said hesitatingly. "What do you say, Frank? You know your future father-in-law's peculiarities better than I can guess them."

Frank did not answer immediately; he knew that for him to try to explain matters to Mr. Verner while the latter still smarted under the shock of an immense disappointment would be only to court a rebuff. If Essie's father had never said in so many plain words that he gave his daughter to the future Lord of De Walden Court, he had at least let his feeling be very clearly understood. The young man recalled, with a painful little flush, the eager interest with which he had studied the De Walden pedigree and computed the De Walden acres, the fancy pictures he had drawn of pretty Essie, installed as Lady Bountiful and mistress of the quaint old Manor House. He never for an instant seemed to think that his son-in-law's life could be in any way influenced by his profession.

It was only the other day, the young man remembered bitterly, that Essie herself had called her father to account for this curious peculiarity of his.

"Why, papa," she cried, opening her big eyes widely, and shaking back the dusky perfumed love-locks that clustered about her pretty head, "you talk as though we were only to live for and at De Walden! Frank does not reign there yet, you know; and, even when he does, he will still have his profession. How would you like a Lord Chancellor for a son-in-law?"

Mr. Verner laughed at the grotesque suggestion as he looked down at the lovely upturned face and rattled the sovereigns comfortably in his trousers pocket; but he answered it seriously all the same.

"I should not care much about him, Essie; I prefer Frank as he is. Any clever fellow, with luck and working-powers, may mount the woolsack; but it takes some centuries to give a man an historic name and such a fine old ivy-grown herritage as De Walden Court."

Frank had laughed carelessly at the pompous words then; but they came back sharply to his memory now, and the pang they cost him wrung a little weary sigh from his lips.

It was echoed by one from Sir George's. The latter pushed his glass away, and said in a disappointed tone—

"I see you do not approve my proposition. You think by interfering I should only make matters worse."

"By no means, sir," Frank answered, rousing himself at once, and speaking with unmistakeable earnestness and sincerity. "I think it more than possible that Mr. Verner would listen with something like decent civility to you. To me—in the first flush of his indignation—he certainly would not."

"Very well then, I will try my luck to-morrow."

Frank tugged thoughtfully at his moustache, and tried in a quick fancy sketch to bring the interview before him, and bring it to a satisfactory conclusion. But in this latter attempt at least he utterly failed; even had there been no illusion to destroy, no painful revelation to make, Sir George de Walden and Constantine Verner were men so diametrically opposite that he could not imagine them coalescing.

"I—I am afraid you will find the task you undertake no easy one," he said, with a faint smile. "Mr. Verner is——"

"A man who, through my instrumentality, has been deceived, whose hopes I have raised in an unjustifiable fashion—therefore a man who has every claim upon my forbearance," Sir George finished grandly.

"You need not think my temper will fail me, Frank, even if I do have to listen to a few hard words. I shall let Mr. Verner's indignation exhaust itself, and then, as he calms down, appeal to him, as a sensible man of the world, to listen to a just and reasonable proposition."

Sir George was so evidently delighted with and confident in the success of his plan that Frank had not the heart to put forward any further objection; besides, it was so easy and pleasant to catch the infection of the old man's hope, to believe and think that, where so much—the happiness of his whole life, thought the poor young lover—was at stake, all must go well.

"Well, you will do your best, I know, sir; and, when your interview with Mr. Verner is over, provided that it does not end in a quarrel——"

"As I promise you it shall not," Sir George broke in lightly. "Well, when your amicable conference is at an end—what then?"

"Why, then you will see Essie," the young fellow answered, with a broken laugh; "and then you will understand."

"How much I have made you suffer in these twenty-four hours of suspense!" Sir George said, resting his hand with an earnest kind pressure on his nephew's arm. "But it will be over when I see you again, and your happiness will be assured on a firmer and safer basis than it has had yet. I do not, will not doubt of my success, and you must not doubt it either; in fact, my greatest anxiety is now—Miss Essie herself."

"You need not doubt her; she is an angel of unselfishness, sir."

"No doubt; but you have raised my expectations rather high, you must admit; and, if I find her anything short of perfection in female form, I shall not think her worthy of your eulogium, or, indeed, of my nephew Frank."

Frank did not answer; but his smile was eloquent enough. He had no doubt of Essie's perfections, no fear that his uncle would fail to recognise them at first sight.

MONEY IN BASE BALL.

Some of the Men who have Grown Rich on the Nation Game.

The salary of the professional base ball player is something often talked about, and the figures are generally placed too high, but for an actual fact the professional player of to-day, providing he possesses ability of the right order, fares better than the ordinary member of any other profession. Al Spalding, the President of the Chicago Club, is perhaps the richest man in the business to-day, and Al Beach, the organizer of the Philadelphia Club, is another who has laid away something for a rainy day. Spalding's wealth is estimated at between $200,000 and $300,000, and Reach's possessions are placed at the same figures. Big-hearted Jim Mutrie organized the Metropolitan Club of New York, and cleared nearly $100,000 the first season, but none of the money went to Jim, and he is as poor to-day as when he started out. Billy Barnie played in better luck than Mutrie. He and Mauck, a Baltimore bill poster, placed the Baltimore American team in the field last year, and scored a great hit, the club making nearly $65,000 its first year, with the prospect of nearly doubling that amount this. Four years ago Barnie came here with the Atlantics and hadn't $50 to his name. To-day he can draw his check for $50,000, or something not much less than that amount, and this is doing pretty well for one who started out with the reputation of being a broken-down catcher. Emil Gross, who catches for the Chicago Unions in their coming games here, owns $50,000 worth of real estate in Chicago, but this does not represent his earnings, he having fallen heir to the property. Mike McGeary has made enough money out of base ball to buy several houses in Philadelphia, and Anson of the Chicagos has bought a farm with the proceeds of his earnings, and also owns stock in the Chicago Club.

George Wright owns quite an establishment in Boston, and Harry Wright, now managing the Philadelphia Club, is also doing well, but neither have more wealth than they know what to do with. Of the St. Louis players Dunlap of the Unions is the most solid man, while Gleason of the American team owns the house he lives in, and is pretty well fixed financially. George Strief owns a neat home in Cleveland, and Latham is another thrifty and well-to-do player. But these men are about all there are of the present and of the old rank and file who are even well-to-do. Of course others have made money in the business, but they did not belong to the old ranks. Lew Simmons, for example, knew but little about base ball until about three years ago, when he, Sharsig, and Mason organized the Athletic Club and the trio since that time have cleared between $200,000 and $300,000 on the venture. Theirs was the greatest success, financially, ever scored in the base ball world.

The poorest paid club in the American Association to-day is the Louisville. Nearly all were frightened into signing $1,000 contracts. This gave the players no money to spend for whiskey, or something worse, and as a result they are in first class fix and playing first-class ball. The New York League team of last year, which was called "The $40,000 Gilt-edge Nine," made the poorest kind of a record for itself, the time of the players being mostly taken up in spending their salaries, instead of training and getting in trim for play. The Chicago nine of this year, perhaps the highest salaried nine in the League, seems to be following in the rut of last year's New York Club, and the high-salaried nine which represents St. Louis in the American Association is not doing so well this year as it did last, when its salary was not so high.—St. Louis Critic.

The Thermometer.

Mr. R. H. Scott, President of the Royal Meteorological Society, London, has compiled some interesting notes on the history of the thermometer. The name of the actual inventor of the instrument is unknown, and the earliest mention of it as a scientific appliance, then fifty years old, was in a work by Dr. R. Fludd, published in 1638. As to the instrument as it now exists, Robert Hooker suggested the use of the freezing point, Halley the boiling point, and the substitution of mercury for spirit, and Newton blood heat. Fahrenheit, although a German by birth, was a protege of James I., and died in England. Reaumur's thermometer in its final form owes its origin to De Luc; and although the centigrade thermometer is almost universally attributed to Celsius, it was really invented by Linnæus. Celsius' instrument had its scale the reverse way, the boiling point being 0° and the freezing point 100°.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of Catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients present themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

The Great Inflammatory Remedy.

Nerviline, the latest discoved pain remedy, may safely challenge the world for a substitute that will as speedily and promptly check inflammatory action. The highly penetrating properties of Nerviline make it never failing in all cases of rheumatism, neuralgia, cramps, pains in the back and side, headache, lumbago, etc. It possesses marked stimulating and counter-irritant properties, and at once subdues all inflammatory action. O'mand & Walsh, druggists, Peterboro', writes: "Our customers speak well of Nerviline." Nerviline may be tested at the small sum of 10 cents, as you can buy a sample bottle for that sum at any drug store. Large bottles 25 cents. Try Nerviline the great internal and external pain cure. Sold by all druggists and country dealers.

FOR THE FARMER.

Food and Breed as Affecting Quality of Milk.

Dr. Voelker recently delivered the opening lecture of a course of lectures before the students of the Royal Agricultural College at Cirencester, England, and in the course of his remarks on dairying had the following to say upon the influence of food and breed on the quality of milk:

"In 1862 I made some experiments with a view of finding out, if possible, how it was that some of our cows produced at that time such bad milk. Our cows were wretchedly fed, and we had rancid butter and very indifferent cheese. I wanted to find the reason of the poor milk, and I saw the cows milked, and when I analyzed the milk regularly in the laboratory I was perfectly astounded to find how, with a change of food, the character of the milk changed immediately. In the month of September, 1862, our cows gave milk that only contained 1½ per cent of pure butter fat—you can add one quarter more to represent the quantity of commercial butter—and 90.7 per cent. of water. In the evening the cows milked a little poorer—90 7 per cent. of water, and only a little over 1 1-2 per cent. of pure butter fat. Mr. Coleman thought the scant herbage accounted for this poverty of the milk, and also for the scanty supply which the cows furnished. He therefore put the cows in the stable in the morning, and gave them hay, mangolds and rape cake, (rape cake is very good food when you can get it free from mustard), and the result was that immediately the quality of the milk improved. Then he gave them cocoa palm-nut meal, with the same result and so rapid was the improvement that, by feeding the cows concentrated food in the morning, the milk of the following morning was immediately very much richer than that of the evening before, so that in something like six hours the food told upon the quality of the milk.

"It is surprising how rapidly oily matters introduced into the food will find their way into the milk. I mention this to throw a little light upon the question whether morning or evening milk is the better. It is entirely a question of feeding. If you feed the cows well in the day, the evening milk is rich, and if you leave off the feed at night the morning milk is poor. As a rule, therefore, the evening milk is somewhat richer than the morning, but it does not follow that it is invariably the case. I find, for instance, during the twelve months to which I have referred, that out of thirty-two couples of morning and evening milk, in eight cases the morning milk was poorer than the evening; on four days the morning milk was the richer, while on the remaining four days there was no appreciable difference between the quality of the morning and evening milk.

"From a table before me, I see I have stated as much as four per cent. of pure butter fat, and I have found as little as 1½ per cent. I have found similar difference in experiments which for the last four years I have carried on under my own personal supervision, seeing the cows milked, and so forth, at the show of the British Dairy Farming Association at Islington. In 1879 I had in the showyard an Ayrshire cow whose milk produced 5 1-2 per cent. of pure butter fat, while that of a Dutch cow gave as little as as little as 2 1-2 per cent. In the preceding years we had similar variations, and I cannot help giving you the results of the last year's milk trials which have just passed through my hands, relating to the show held on the 24th October last, and I confine my quotations to prize winners. The first prize animal, a large Dutch cow, a very profitable animal to the milk dealers, gave in the morning 31 lbs. 4 oz., or about three gallons, and in the evening 29 lbs., or 60 lbs. 4 oz, roughly speaking six gallons of milk in the day. But when we examined the milk I found that the produce of the Dutch cow gave only 2 86 of pure butter fat, total solids 12,12, leaving 88 per cent. of water—evidently not a rich milk. The second prize cow, a very taking little cow, gave in the morning 15 1-2 lbs.; in the evening 11 lbs., total 56 1-2 lbs. of milk per day, or about 2 1 2 gallons, less than half the quantity of the Dutch cow. But the milk of the Devon cow gave 5 1-2 per cent. of pure butter fat, and would, therefore, make 1¾ lbs. of saleable butter per day, while the six gallons of milk of the Dutch cow would only make 1 1-2 lbs. of butter."

Cutting Timothy.

The following method is that of an educated Indiana farmer: Timothy, unquestionably makes much the best hay for all kinds of stock when well cured, which is more easily accomplished than with any other grass, but which is not always done, by any means; and yet is as worthless as need be when cut at an unseasonable time or handled in an unintelligent manner. My rule for cutting timothy, is when it is in that state, if possible, and that is when the major part of the field is in bloom. Most of the seeds were then in milk, and each of them, perhaps, before I was through, I never cut my grass, wet or dry, before I was ready, as some do. But my rule is to begin the first fair day after I think the gluten, starch and sugar are most abundant in the stalks and leaves, and then push on the work as fast as possible during the dry weather, and while there is plenty of sunshine. I never cut grass for hay when it is wet from much dew, or even after very little rain. Only a careful observation of the weather is needed generally, to secure the crop in good condition. During the summer season two or three days of dry or rainy weather is usually followed by about the same number of good, or fairly good hay-cutting weather, alternating in this manner through the season, except in case of severe drought or excessive rains.

Top-Dressing Fields.

We are more and more impressed with the importance of top-dressing mowing lands. Of course cultivation becomes necessary for the production of different crops, but otherwise the maintenance of mowing lands could be effected by top-dressing. Upon ground that is naturally rough and hilly, cultivation and re-seeding often gives a return for considerable labor in the removal of stones brought to the surface; in such cases, if once a good sod is secured, the maintenance by top-dressing becomes very agreeable and satisfactory. We have noted with satisfaction the effect of a top-dressing in the late fall of 1882. It was upon a field in which the grass was growing very thin. Last season there was a considerable increase, but it remained for this spring to exhibit a most remarkable increase of growth of clover and timothy, which was nearly or quite exterminated, as far as appearance would indicate. We know that there are farmers who think little of top-dressing, but our experience has been that upon our soil top-dressing uniformly produces good results.

Pulverizing the Soil.

One of the conditions of success in the cultivation of the soil is its pulverization. Without this the operation of culture becomes tedious, and its results unsatisfactory. For two seasons we have noticed the operation of the disc harrow, as it is employed upon a sod newly turned over. In both instances the sod was as well turned as could be expected, but fully showed the furrows, and gave evidence that it was sod before the use of the harrow, but after using the harrow, passing over the piece thoroughly, no one could detect any appearance that it was sod. The entire surface was well pulverized, and in excellent condition to receive seed of any kind that might be planted, or even for reseeding. Of course in order to secure the most satisfactory results requires that the soil be free from stones, so as to admit of the free use of the several discs, of which the harrow is composed. We should imagine that as an implement for the preparation of the soil for the preparation of the soil for seeding down, the disc harrow with the roller would serve a most excellent purpose.

Dedicating a Mormon Temple.

Discretion seemed to me to be the better part of valor, and I remained in Zion while thousands of Saints hied them to Cache Valley to view the Logan temple as the "grandest edifice of its kind that has been erected in this dispensation." Though not in Logan on this eventful occasion, I have obtained some important facts from Saints who were. To begin with the editors of Logan's own newspapers, the Utah Journal worked like beavers on the day preceding the dedication collecting statistics of the temple, the number of donors and their names, the cost of the edifice, etc. These enterprising brethren had their type set up, and were about to print, when orders came from the prophet John Taylor that the result of their blessed labor was to be "knocked into pie!" Tell the world that Logan temple cost $500,000! Put the United States Government in possession of such important information, when the law limits every church to $50,000 worth of property in any given locality! It wouldn't do. So the foiled journalists labored all night to fill the aching void, and the Latterday saints again proved their astuteness. On the night before the dedication John Taylor received a revelation direct from God that he accepted the temple, the ground and sacrifice of the saints. All was pronounced "good," as at the creation of the world, and the next morning it took the "Almighty's mouthpiece" thirty minutes to bless every stone, chair, window, door, pane of glass, etc., pertaining to the holy edifice. This prayer was "so complete and perfect," declares a good saint, as to "seem to comprise everything on earth and in Heaven pertaining to the offering of the temple." There's no doubting this statement. I doubt whether a bolt or a bar was forgotten. In reading the prayer I wonder what a deity of supreme intelligence thought of this mass of verbiage, provided He thought of it at all. Only Mormon patience could endure such a Niagara of words. Everything in this world depends upon the point of view. "Never," asserts one of the best of Mormon women, "never since the time when we witnessed the remarkable, one might say marvelous, occurrence which transpired in Nauvoo at the time when the mantle of the Prophet Joseph appeared so plainly to fall upon Brigham Young, have we seen any manifestation of divine acceptance so distinctly clear as during the dedication services in the Logan temple—a sensation as though myriads of angels were in attendance and taking cognizance of that which transpired."

It is significant that, the prayer excepted, very brief reports of the three days' services were given to the public. One who was there affirms that the greater part of the preaching dwelt upon obedience to the priesthood and upon the glories of celestial marriage. The prophet, John Taylor, repeating himself, declared that no man should hold office in the church, who did not carry out the sublime principle of plural wives, and branded every man as a "coward" who did not at once obey God's command. He defied the United States Government to harm "this people" or stay their onward march. The world would yet see a temple in New York City, built by the saints, and dedicated to the God of Israel! Aye, this would come to pass, in spite of all Hell!"—[Kate Field in Boston Herald.

Origin of the Bayonet.

In the short reign of James II. the first step was taken towards the abolition of the use of pikes in our Army by the introduction of the practice of sticking the dagger into the muzzle of the musket, in order to protect the men when charged by cavalry immediately after they had fired. It is said that this practice, which was borrowed from the French, was the origin of the bayonet. The daggers were for many years affixed to the musket by having their long handles, in some cases a foot in length, jammed down the muzzles. At what time the mode of fixing the bayonet so as not to prevent the loading and firing of the piece was adopted in England it is not very easy to discover; but the improvement is said to have originated in France; and the following anecdote in Grose's Treatise on Ancient Armour seems to support this—"In one of the campaigns of King William III. in Flanders there were three French regiments whose bayonets were made to fix after the present fashion, a contrivance then unknown in the British Army. One of them advanced against the 25th Regiment with fixed bayonets. Lieut.-Colonel Maxwell, who commanded it, ordered his men to screw their bayonets into the muzzles of their muskets to receive the enemy; but, to his great surprise when the French came within a proper distance, they threw in a heavy fire, which for a moment staggered his people, who by no means expected such a greeting, not conceiving how it was possible to fire with fixed bayonets. They nevertheless recovered themselves, charged, and drove the enemy out of the line." The word "bayonet" is believed to have been derived from the town of Bayonne, in the extreme south-west of France, the first weapons of this description—used to convert muskets, as it were, into pikes—having been made there.

MURDERED HIS FATHER-IN-LAW.

A Sensational Story by a Deserted Wife from Texas.

The readers of the Enquirer will remember a paragraph which appeared in this paper a few days ago referring to a woman named Lizzie Perry, who reported to Capt. Devine, at the central station, that her husband had stoled her 4-months old child, which she was wheeling in a baby-carriage on West Court street. The story, when related by the excited mother, at once enlisted the sympathies of the police, who promised to give her every assistance possible to reclaim her child. She sobbed pitifully that he would kill the babe. The officers attempted to persuade her that her husband would not attempt such a rash act. "Oh, yes, he would," replied the weeping mother; "I saw him kill my gray-haired father before my eyes." This sudden and unlooked-for announcement put a different phase to her story, and when questioned by the captain as to the correctness of her statement she related the following harrowing story, which, if true, would make her liege lord an undesirable citizen in any community:

"Charles Perry, the young man who is the author of all my recent troubles, arrived in the state of Texas a little over four years ago, and settled down at Brookstone, Le Mar county, Texas, where, after a short courtship, we were married. Not, however, I am sorry to say, with the approbation and consent of my father, who was a prosperous trader in the country. I was not long in perceiving a growing jealousy between my father and husband, which culminated in the death of a food parent at the hands of a worthless husband. An arrest quickly followed and the whole community were much agitated over the tragedy, as 'old man Robinson' (my father) was respectably connected. At first I concluded to abandon my husband and leave him to his fate. But his constant pleading caused me to relent, and I called to see him at the jail where he was incarcerated awaiting his trial. After several ineffectual attempts in procuring bail I was at last successful in inducing Capt. Shelton, a very wealthy man, who, through sympathy for me, consented to go on his bond.

"When the date fixed for the trial drew near my husband began to grow extremely nervous, and finally announced his intention of leaving the state. I consented to share with him the hardships and perils of such a course, knowing that in doing so I would incur the hatred of all my former friends. But, woman like, I clung to him, for which I am now repentant. Indian Territory was the first place in which we concluded to stop, as we felt secure from further pursuit, and in that wild region my child was born. My husband becoming dissatisfied with the place, at last concluded to start for Cincinnati, where we arrived a short time since. The relatives and friends of my husband live here, and he is protected in his extreme cruelty towards me. I know he will kill or take my innocent babe to his mother's home, and they will send it away."

The poor woman, after she had concluded the tale of the wrong she had suffered under such trying and peculiar circumstances, started out of the station in quest of her stolen child. Charles Perry, the husband, who, with his child, was stopping at his sister's, No. 424 West Ninth street, read the paragraph and at once repaired to the central station, stating that he was the man whom it was claimed through the press had on the day before stolen his own child, if there was such a crime. Capt. Devine asked him to relate his version of the story and all the circumstances connected with his domestic life. Mr. Perry, who is yet quite a young man and with nothing about his general appearance that would indicate bloodthirstiness, began, and in a clear and precise manner made the following statement:

"Some time ago I left Cincinnati, and in my traveling about I found myself in the Lone Star state, where I concluded to remain, and worked steadily for quite awhile, and in the meantime became acquainted with my wife, then Miss Lizzie Robinson, whose father was a well-to-do citizen of the place. Like many young men, I became infatuated, and made up my mind to marry Miss Robinson. I went to her father and asked for his consent, but was met with a blank refusal, and told to discontinue my visits about the place, but his objections were ignored in a clandestine marriage. Such a course made my father-in-law a bitter enemy. We had many quarrels, but nothing of a serious nature, as I concluded to leave the place, and come on here. I am sorry to say my wife contracted a strong desire for drink, and I attempted several times to break her of the habit, but without success. When we arrived here a short time ago she drank so that I was compelled to leave her. I went to my sister's and my wife was given lodging at the Home of the Friendless. Yesterday I was passing up Court street, and when near Mound street my wife spied me. She left the child on the sidewalk and ran away. Of course, I took my child and brought it home. I could not leave it in the street. I promised her to pay her board and give her money besides, but would not live with her."

"But she says you killed her father. Is there any truth in her statement?"

"Yes, I did; but it was a clear case of self-defense, and I was acquitted of the charge of manslaughter. The deed occurred one evening while seated at the supper table. He attacked me with a dirk-knife, and here is the wound that he gave me."

Mr. Perry opened his shirt and exhibited an ugly scar on the left breast.

"This was inflicted while Robinson had me down on the floor. I reached out and picked up a small hand-ax which was lying near the stove, and dealt him one blow on the head. It was that blow that killed him and saved me, as in a second more I would have received another stab which would have ended my life. He died the next day, and I was taken to the hospital. The talk she made of my jumping my bail is all nonsense, as I was not on bail, but lying helpless in the hospital with my life despaired of.

"If you desire I will inform you from whom you can learn the truth of the affair." The statement made by Perry is no doubt correct, as the superintendent of the Children's Home heard his request to his wife, which she refused to comply with. Mr. Perry says that he never intends to live with his wife again. Perry is said to be a brother of the notorious Ben Perry, who is said to be a brother of the notorious Ben Perry, who is wanted for burglary.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

A Gambler's Suicide—Siberian Cattle Plague—Cruelty to a Child—in the Seine, &c., &c.

Another link, connecting Portugal with Spain,—namely, the railway from Salamanca to the frontier, where it joins the general system of the Portuguese railways,—is now expected to be completed in September next.

Munkacsy's new picture, "Christ on the Cross," is the new excitement with the art world in Paris. The picture, critics say, even exceeds, both in beauty of composition, color, and technique, the artist's other great work, "Christ Before Pilate."

A few days ago an English sailor entered a cafe in Boulogne, and, having lit his pipe, departed, forgetting his match box. Shortly afterward some one in authority entered the place and spied the pieces a conviction. The rightful owner having disappeared, the landlord had to pay the penalty—namely, 30 francs, or one franc for each match.

A fisherman named Flood has died at Drogheda from blood poisoning caused by a bite inflicted on his face during a savage fight with a man named Murphy. The bite was followed by a hideous leprosy of sores, which eat away the flesh on the throat and chest, leaving the muscles bare. The doctors certify that death was caused by the bite. Murphy is in custody.

The Siberian cattle plague has this year assumed enormous proportions. From the 1st to the 15th of January 533 head perished in Tchiginsk, 217 in Bieloff, 170 in East Aleisk, and 140 in Zimin. In the district of Tcharitttheaky the loss in three weeks among five villages amounted to 1,150 head. The peasantry in many districts become more and more impoverished, and seek a remedy in constant migrations.

The annual returns published by the prefecture of police show that there has for the last three or four years been an increase in the number of fires in Paris. The total in 1880 was 2,097, of which 1,509 were chimney fires only, but last year the total had risen to 2,593, of which 1,688 were chimney fires. The number of persons burnt to death last year was 8, and 51 firemen were more or less seriously injured. Honorary rewards were conferred upon 39 firemen for special acts of bravery.

Berlin was treated to another pageant recently in the shape of a grand historical procession, organized by the Guild of Shoemakers, in celebration of the sexcentenary of its existence. The procession, which attracted enormous numbers of spectators, was viewed from the balcony of the palace by the emperor and the crown prince, and also by Prince Bismarck, as it passed along the Wilhelm strasse. One of the historical groups delineated Hans Sachs and his surroundings, while another showed the development of the shoemaking art.

The latest sport in Paris among the young gommeux of the day is to offer a supper in some of the swell restaurants, where the room and the lights were given by the host for a costly sum, while the guests are only allowed the food which they bring, and which they must steal on their way down to the rendezvous. The fashion was set some years since by the Duke de Morny. It is to be presumed that any flagrant act of appropriation to the needs of the moment would in the end be paid for, but for the time being the viands, wines, and flowers have all the flavor of stolen sweets.

Mr. Bryan M lloy was tried at the Dublin commission court, a few days ago, on the charge of bigamy. He had married a number of wives,—it was not known precisely how many,—but five had been traced. The defense set up for him was insanity, and it was proved that he was of weak intellect; that he had several times been in lunatic asylums at home and on the continent, and that he came of a highly respectable family, in which, it was stated, insanity is hereditary. He was convicted and ordered to be detained in an asylum during the lord lieutenant's pleasure. All his wives—at least all the police have been able to get together—were in court.

Chios, which is still suffering from the effects of the earthquakes, is now visited by another calamity. A large number of the lemon and orange trees, which form one of the chief resources of the island, are attacked by an unknown disease, and specialists are being sent by the minister of commerce to make investigations into the matter. Meanwhile the pious inhabitants are having recourse to supernatural remedies. Having chartered a special steamer, they have brought from one of the monasteries of Mount Athos a miracle-working girdle of the Virgin, and a grand procession, headed by the orthodox metropolitan, is bearing the sacred relic through the orchards.

Ellen Cashion and Anastatia Rourke were arrested at Clonmel, Ireland, recently, charged with cruelly ill-treating a child 3 years old, named Phillip Dillon. The prisoners were taken before the mayor, when evidence was given showing an extraordinary survival of superstitious belief. It appeared that the neighbors fancied that the child, which had not the use of its limbs, was a changeling left by the fairies in exchange for the original child. While the mother was absent the prisoners entered her house and placed the child naked on a hot shovel, under the impression that this would break the charm. The child was severely burned. The prisoners were remanded. They were hooted by the crowd.

For the third time a new head has just been placed upon the carving of Maj. John Andre in the beautiful fresco upon his tomb in Westminster abbey. Exactly six cases of sacrilege have occurred at this tomb. The heads of George Washington and Maj. Andre, both being prominent in the fresco, have been three times stolen respectively. Americans are fond of taking home samples of what they see in "old country," and the tomb of this unfortunate English gentleman has, it is supposed, especially suffered in this way. The last theft of Maj. Andre's head occurred during an organ recital by Dr. Bridge upon the splendid new instrument by Messrs. Hill & Sons; and the head has been cleverly replaced by a new carving.

There are no fewer than 25,000 persons in France afflicted with blindness. In aid of the indigent of this class an admirable performance of M. Gounod's "Redemption" was recently given in Paris under the direction of the gifted composer, who is said to have "entered into the spirit of his task with all the ardor of an enthusiastic youth eager to win his spurs." The solo singers were the same as on the occasion of the only previous hearing of the oratorio in France, except that the principal soprano part devolved on Mme. Rides Devrar, who acquitted herself of her task in a truly musician-like manner. M. Faure again spoke the sacred words of the bass part with a dignity and solemnity, perhaps, that no other singer could approach.

M. Pasteur's intention to establish at Meudon a range of kennels for subjects used in his rabies experiments causes the population of that peaceful and picturesque suburban resort great anxiety. M. Pasteur's idea, of course, was that no one could possibly object to the presence of his mad dogs on the confines of an ample wood. But in this he proves to have been mistaken. The mayor of Meudon has appealed, on behalf of his commune, to the minister of the interior, and also to the press. However carefully the dogs might be watched, the mere idea of having them for close neighbors would, he urges, effectually prevent quiet Parisians from making Meudon their suburban home and place of recreation, and thus the place would be ruined.

Three men, named Jones, Walker, and Mackness, who had spent Whitsun week in jail for refusing to have their children vaccinated, were liberated from Leicester prison, England, recently. A large concourse of spectators assembled in front of the prison, accompanied by a brass band, and the men were welcomed with great cheering. They were driven in a carriage and entertained at breakfast, in a procession headed by the brass band afterward marching through the principal streets of the town. Resolutions condemning the vaccination acts and imprisonment of men for conscience sake were passed at a large meeting. The goods of twenty persons have been seized for nonpayment of vaccination fines, and they will be sold by public auction.

A good story comes from an Anglo-Indian legion. A sub-lieutenant took sick leave, and spent his leisure in the steps preliminary to getting married. The colonel heard of the indiscretion, and peremptorily telegraphed, "Join at once." With the fatal order in his hand, the youth proceeded to say farewell to his betrothed. But the lady was more intelligent in military matters. "I am glad that the colonel approves the match," she said; "but why is he in such a hurry?" The sub-lieutenant was still too literal for the fair one, who had further to explain that to "join at once" meant "marry immediately." The result was that in forty eight hours the colonel received the following reply, per telegraph: "Your orders are obeyed. We were married at once."

M. Louis Maiche, a well-known French engineer, has made a discovery of a hardly less startling character than that of a means to set the Seine on fire. He has discovered a gold mine in the bed of that river. The little fragments of quartz and silex which form the gravel in the bed of the Seine are, according to M. Maiche, remarkably rich in the precious metal. In some of the specimens which he has collected the aurious particles are numerous and visible. The discovery will hardly prove of practical importance. It has been calculated that the pavement of the streets of Strasburg contains gold to the value of 4,000 000 sterling. Unfortunately, it would take just double that amount to extract it, and it is more than probable that the French proverb about the game and the candle will be equally applicable to the pebbles at the bottom of the Seine.

A Walking Stick That Has Travelled.

Col. William Ernesto, a bronzed veteran of the British India service, who passed through Philadelphia a few days ago, carried a cane that is a memento of great events. It is made of nine longitudinal strips of wood; the head is a highly-polished bit of bone from the river drift deposits in Devonshire, England, and the ferule is a fragment of a gun used at the battle of Melegnano. One wooden strip is from the Mount of Olives, at Jerusalem, and of the other eight one is from Nelson's ship, the Victory, or from the American sloop-of-war Cumberland, and one from the Alabama, cut before she left Laird's ship-yard; one from the Bellerophon, Napoleon's prison ship, one from the Ville de Paris, Admiral de Grasse's flag-ship in our revolutionary war; one from the floor of the black hole at Calcutta; one from the grove surrounding Taj Mahal, and the last from the wreck of the Royal George. Col. Ernesto has written a sketch of the circumstances under which each piece of the cane was obtained, and the whole put together, and on his death it and the manuscript are to be deposited in the South Kensington Museum. Each circumstance regarding the gathering of the pieces is properly attested.

Only One of the Nine.

A man with a mograful expression of countenance sat in the corner of the smoking car. One of his eyes was hidden by a green flap, the other gave evidence that it had violently come in contact with some hard substance. His nose looked as though it had been flattened against a window pane when he was a boy and never regained its natural shape. One ear was missing and the other drooped like a wilted morning glory. His left arm was in a sling, and no two fingers of his right hand pointed in the same direction.

When the conductor came along he gazed compassionately at the wreck before him and said, inquiringly:

"Collision?"

"No," growled the human debris.

"Prize fight?"

"No."

"Mother-in-law?"

"No."

"Dog?"

"No."

"Then what under the sun has broke you all up?"

"Base ball," groaned the victim, pulling his slouched hat down over his frescoed eye.

Coaching parties from which the tyrant man is excluded promise to become mildly popular among the ladies. The first of the season was given in retaliation for a party which has enjoyed by none but men, and it was tedious in so inconsiderable a degree that others of the same sort was talked of. Of course the ladies do not hold the rein, and wind the horn, but maybe they will do the former in the course of a few seasons when the present "horsy" tendency in fashionable life shall have borne fruit.

The Standard.

MARKDALE JULY. 10, 1884.

Egypt.

The egitation for the formal annexation of Egypt to England is becoming more definite and popular in the mother land. Some of the prominent politicians have been of late speaking earnestly in its behalf. It would certainly be a grert blessing to the land of Egypt to have a stable and honest government. It would also be in the interest of the commerce of the world. Egypt, because of its geographical position, and because of its agricultural resources, is of a good deal of importance to the world of commerce—of so much importance that the great commercial nations cannot well afford to allow it to continue under anarchy and dissention as it so long has under its present system. The Suez canal is of far grater importance to other countries than to Egypt, and its safety must not be imperilled. England may not desire to intermeddle in the internal affairs of that ancient land, but the interests of England, and of the rest of the civilized world, are so intimately identified with the great canal that it cannot afford to stand by and see anarchy rampant there. England cannot afford to go on, year after year, putting down the internal rebellions against the week government of Egypt. It looks now as though nothing but grasping permanent possession with a firm hand will prove a true solution of Egyptian difficulty.

Street Improvement.

Statute labor for this season is about completed in this village, and the trustees have decided on a rate to belevied to meet the expenses and pay for street and sidewalk improvements for the season, and the question naturally arises in the mind of village ratepayers; why should we pay our regular rate for municipal purposes, road appropriations &c. &c., and then have a special rate imposed for the mantainance of our public streets, why not have our just proportion returned from the treasury of the municipalities into which it is paid, to meet our road improvement expense instead of having to pay it twice? And again we ask? Why? Well, perhaps the question will not be such a hard one to answer, did we ever ask for any return for such purposes? The good book says "Ask and ye shall receive." Now we would advise the ratepayers to ask. It is certainly a reasonable request. The village of Markdale pays into Glenelg treasury about one eighth of the entire taxes of the township independent of that portion of what comprises Ward No. 3, (Markdale Ward,) and what return has she ever received? Markdlae is justly entitled to a grant of at least from $50 to $100 a year for the past ten years independent of what other portions of the ward has received, and yet she has never received the first dollar, then we would say by all means petition the council for a grant and if they will not do the square thing, then there is another course open. We do not how ever anticipate any serious opposition from the present councils, they are composed of intelligent men who will we have no doubt, act conscientious in the matter.

Town Hall.

We can see no reason why two or three, or more, might not form themselves into a joint stock company, and erect a town hall in this place, and make it a good investment. We understand Mrs. Rutledge, of the Markdale House has offered a site free, while two other citizens has volunteered to put $300 into such a company, now if the project was taken hold of in a business like manner, we might have a substantial town hall before the snow flies, which would be a great convenience as well as a credit to the place! Who will take the lead.

Toronto.

Those who attended the Semi-centennial have returned highly pleased with Toronto, the occasion has proved an important and creditable epoch in the history of the city, which is destined in the near future to be one of the finest, if not the foremost, on the American Continent.

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

The sudden change in the weather caused some to fear an attack offrost, but so far we have escaped.

Master J. McGregor has returned from the pharmaceutical college, having successfully passed his examination as chemist.

Our schools in the village and surrounding townships have closed for the holidays, and the teachers have betaken themselves, in various directions to recuperate their wasted energies.

The trustees received only one tender for the building of the new school house. They have not yet decided on the site. Another vote is expected on the question.

Mr. Clark, tailor, intends building a fine brick with two shops and dwelling in connection.

Mrs. T. W. Parsons is visiting friends in Toronto.

The cheese factory continues to give satisfaction to its patrons.

The junior minister of the Methodist church has not yet arrived. Will he come?

Rev S. Sieveright is at present in charge of the presbyterian congregation here. It is said a call will be extended to him.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

ASLEEP IN JESUS,

Mrs. R. J. Sproule, wife of R. J. Sproule, Esq., of this village, departed this life after a lingering illness of several months, on Wednesday, July 2nd. Deceased bore herpainful illness with calm christian fortitude, resting only upon the loving heart and strong arm of Jesus, believing for her to live was Christ, to die was gain. Her last words were come Jesus come. She was for many years a consistent and active member of the Methodist church, her daily walk and lite throughout was quiet in keeping with her profession her many kind acts and, sympathizing words will not be soon forgotten. On Friday afternoon her remains were followed by a large number of sorrowing relatives and friends, and interred in the Flesherton cemetery. The deceased's Sabbath School class of little girls who were much attached to her, marched in two's in procession after the mourners each carrying a boquet of flowers, and after the coffin had been lowered, passed round the open grave and each dropped in their flowers upon the coffin lid.

On Sabbath evening Rev. Mr. McDowell preached an earnest and touching funeral sermon from the words, "Be thou truthful until death and I will give thee a crown of life." Rev., 2nd & 10.

A runaway team which came dashing into our village a few days ago alarmed some of the citizens but fortunately no one happened to be in their course. Some men tried to stop them but no use, until in their mad carear they dashed into Mr. Sproule's shed, the horses out of wind, and the harness and waggon pretty well shaken up.

A more serious accident happened to Mr. Thos. Duncan some days ago. While driving down one of the hills at the station here, the neckyoke broke the horses frighted and started to run taking part of the vehicle with them and throwing a part with Mr. Duncan over an enbankment the wheels passing over Mr. D. who was picked up unconscious but in a short time regained consciousness. Dr. Christoe was at once sent for and upon examination found one leg broken below the knee, but no other injuries of a serious character. Mr. D. is since improving as rapidly as can be expected.

Personals.

Mrs. R. D. Irvine is home on a visit.

Mr. Geo. and Miss Ella Reynolds of Normood, are visiting friends in Markdale.

Rev. J. S. Corcoran moved to Hepworth, his new station, on Tuesday.

Mrs. Arnott and Mrs. Tackabery of Sault Ste Marie, are visiting friends in this vicinity.

Mr. W. A. McLeod, merchant of Manitouhn came down on Saturday and returned last Tuesday.

Mr Dundas stopped off a day this week on his way to Hamilton from Manitoulin, St. Joseph, Port Arthur and other points north.

Mr. Wm. Lucas returned from a visit to Lampton Co. last week, he reports fine prospects in that County for an abundant harvest. The haying is over, and they are this week in the midst of fall wheat harvest.

Priceville.

Dominion Day wss a glad day in Priceville as a very successful Pic-Nic in aid of the building fund of the Presbyterian Church was held. Provisions were provided in abundance and of the best kind, and a very large number of people were in attendance. Their was good music provided, and the games and sports were thoroughly enjoyed, particularly by the young folks, and although surrounded with pic-nics and celibrations, $160 were realized from the gate and tables. This amount was asurprise to the promoters of the Pic nic. The village wore a holliday appearance, and Mr. James Brander had his store very tastefully decorated and a motto "Our Dominion," which was very attractive. Maple boughs were very tastefully interwoven with Red White and Blue and other ornaments which testified to the ingenuity of Mr. Brander, sufficient money by subscription, had been raised previous to the day to cover the prizes offered, so that nearly all the proceeds of the Pic-nic will be devoted to the building fund. The following is the Port Perry in Ashes.

THE flourishing village of Port Perry is reduced to a heap of charred and smouldering ruins by a fire which broke out a little after midnight on Thursday, and which spread in every direction, in three hours destroying every office and store in the place, not a single bulding being left in which business could be again started. The losses are estimated at a quarter of a million dollars. The origin of the fire is generally attributed to incendiarism.

Plenty of Water.—Mr. Thomas Campbell whose farm adjoins this village has had difficulty in procuring a satisfactory supply of water until recently, when he secured the service of S. Wardell who had drilled but six feet in the rock when an abundance of water was obtained. Mr. Wardell has been very successful in drilling for and obtaining this valuable comodity.

The Standard's non appearance on Thursday last in its customery regularity and promptness appeared to throw things generally out of gear, so much so that many of our citizens lost track of the day of the week, In fact they had scarcely regained their whereabouts on Sunday as only 22 were to be seen in the Methodist Church, out of an average congregation of some 200 while other churches were similarly affected. We must endeavor in future to issue on time or give notice beforehand.

The Hay-fork Swindle.—One day last week two hay-fork swindlers called at the residence of Mr. Thomas Brown, of Horning's Mills, and induced him to become their agent for the sale of the "Champion Hay Fork." They got Mr. Brown to sign a paper which they read to him as an advertisement, but it seems was an order for ten forks at $20 each. The following day another of the gang called on Mr. Brown and demanded $200, which was refused. After endavoring in vain to intimidate Mr. Brown, the swindler offered to settle if Brown would buy one fork at $25, and pay him $20 in cash. This offer was also refused, as Mr. Brown had no intention of being swindled out of even $20. The agent then left making loud threats of leagal proceedings. The same gang succeeded in victimizing Mr. Barber, near Honeywood, and got his note for $120. We would advise the farmers of this locality to be prepared for these gentry. If buckshot is too hard, load your old musket with peas, and the first man that says hay fork shoot him on the wing.—Free Press.

"MAY DEW"
The Great French Lotion for Beautifying the Face.

It conceals the evidence of age. One application will make the most stubbornly red and rough hands beautifully soft and white. Remember that "MAY DEW" is not a paint or powder that fills up the pores of the skin, and that is injurious to the skin, but a new and great discovery, a vegetable liquid, that causes the cheek to glow with health, the neck, arms and hands to rival the Lily in whiteness. Impossible to detect in the beauty it confers any artificial character. It cures greasy Skin, Freckles, Wrinkles, Pimples, Black Heads, Crow's Feet, Blotches, Face Grubs, Sun burn, Tan, Ringworm, Chapped Hands, Sore or Chapped Lips, Barber's Itch, Tetter, etc. It frees the pores, oil glands, and tubes from the injurious effects of powders and cosmetic washes. By its use all redness and roughness are prevented; it beautifies the skin, and will make it soft, smooth and white; imparting a delicious softness; imparting a perfectly healthy, natural and youthful appearance. The best face lotion that the world ever produced. We will send "A LARGE BOTTLE" to any address on receipt of price, $1. When ordering mention this paper

TOLD IN A BACKWOOD TAVERN.

Stories of Wild Life Heard Sixty Years Ago by an old New Yorker.

"I lived twenty years in the wilds of Sullivan county, and left them over forty years ago," said the venerable William R. Sands, now a resident of this city, "and have a lively recollection of the old hunters referred to by Fin Teeple, the Pennsylvania Nimrod, in his narrative of old times in the woods of that region, as given in last Sunday's Sun. I was much surprised to hear that Peter Stewart was still living. He must certainly be between 90 and 100 years old. The last time I was in Sullivan County was in 1872, when I attended the funeral of Stephen Curry, one of the pioneers of the county, who died at the age of 101. I remember Nelse Crocker, the panther hunter, whom Teeple mentions as having killed himself because he broke the temperance pledge. He, as well as many others of the old hunters, used to lounge at a tavern kept by an uncle of mine when they were in that vicinity. In those days rum was the favorite beverage, and those free and easy woodsmen punished quantities of it. I can remember, when I was a boy, sixty years ago, sitting on a bench in the bar-room of that old tavern and listened in open-mouthed wonder to their recitals of adventures with panthers, wolves and bears.

"At that time some of them were old men and had roamed the woods before the Indians had given up their claim to them as hunting grounds, and they enlivened the meetings on such occasions with tales of Indian atrocity and personal encounters with the savage, which were then still fresh in their memory. These men lived in different parts of the county, but they seemed to look upon the whole region as a common stamping ground, and it was no unusual thing to see half a dozen hunters in that little bar-room, which was in the town of Neversink, whose homes were thirty miles away in different directions.

"Nelse Crocker was a general favorite because of his great fund of rugged wit and humor and his great sociability. His stories were told in a vein that kept his hearers in a perpetual roar of laughter, his illustrations being broad and original and his powers of mimicry wonderful. He seldom made his own adventures the subject of narration, but always had some good thing to tell, either in favor of or at the expense of some one else. His great bane was rum. Under the influence of that he was but and his sprees lasted for weeks. One of Nelse Crocker's adventures with panthers, or rather the story of it, I recollect as well as if I had heard it only yesterday, although it occured sixty years ago. Crocker lived near White Lake, in Bethel turnpike, where his grandfather had been a pioneer settler, and kept a tavern. In the fall of 1820 Nelse had his cabin in the woods near what was called Big Pond, and one day he and his dog struck the trail of panthers along the edge of Painter Swamp. The practised eye of the hunter discovered that there were tracks of no less than seven of the ferocious animals. He followed the trail with his dog a long distance in the swamp without discovering any game, and then sat down on a log to eat his lunch and rest himself. Suddenly his dog began to bristle up and growl, and the next instant a large panther sprang from a tree near by, almost touching Crocker's shoulder as it shot past him. It struck the ground a few feet beyond and bounded off into the swamp.

"Crocker caught up his gun, and lost no time in starting in pursuit of the panther. The dog had followed it immediately, and was yelping along ahead on the track of the animal. Crocker's dog was an exception to most hunting dogs, for, as I have many times heard the old hunters say, there were very few dogs that would follow a panther's track. Nelse's dog overtook the panther, or probably the panther waited for him. At any rate he pitched into the panther without delay, and was whipped in three seconds. Crocker met his dog coming back badly used up. The hunter went on, and found the panther in a tree. As he was aiming at it, a noise off in the swamp attracted his attention, and looking in that direction, he saw another panther rushing toward him, bounding over the tops of the laurels like a rubber ball. Crocker's interest in the animal in the tree vanished at once, and he turned his gun on the new arrival, and by a lucky shot killed it. The report of the gun was followed immediately by yells of panthers from all parts of the swamp, and, as Crocker had now no dog to aid him, he thought that the best thing he could do would be to beat a retreat from the swamp. Two panthers brought up his rear, but did not approach to within shooting distance of Nelse. They followed him, however, to the edge of the swamp.

"When he reached his cabin he found his dog there ahead of him, looking sheepish and ashamed of himself. The more Nelse thought of the way he had left the field alone to the panthers the madder he got, and when he discovered that he had left his hunting-cap, which was made out of a wolf's skin, behind him in the swamp, he swore that he would go back and recover it, skin the panther he had killed, and tackle the rest of the drove, if he got chawed up himself. The dog wasn't hurt so badly as he thought, but he did not suppose that it would ever go around where there was a panther again. Yet, when Nelse started back for the swamp next morning to redeem his reputation as a panther hunter, what was his surprise to see the dog gather himself up and march resolutely along as if aware that he ought to retrieve his reputation, and was determined to do it.

"On reaching the scene of his encounter with the panthers the day before, Crocker found his hat and the body of the slain panther. Nelse began taking off its skin, when in glancing up in a tree near by, he saw another crouching down on a limb. Crocker shot it, and it tumbled to the ground, but jumped to its feet and climbed to the top of a small chestnut tree, which bent over with the weight until it was only a few feet from the ground. The panther dropped to the ground, and but with one blow of its paw it knocked the dog twenty feet away. Crocker had been trying to reload his gun, but the ramrod stuck in the socket, and delayed him so that the panther, after its bout with the dog, rushed upon him while his gun was still empty. The second experience of the dog was again too much for his valor and he ran away. Crocker, taken at a disadvantage, was also compelled to seek safety in flight. The panther followed him, and was gaining at every jump, when Crocker threw down his rifle. The panther ran to where he had thrown the gun and paused a short time to inspect it, enabling Nelse to make good his escape from the swamp, beyond which the animal did not pursue him.

"When Crocker cooled off he cursed his cowardice, and going to his cabin, he took his hunting axe, which, for some reason, that he was never able to explain, he had failed to carry on either of his other visits to the swamp. Armed with this, he went back to meet the panther he had wounded. He had not long to wait, for he had gone but a short distance in the thicket when the infuriated beast sprang out of the bushes, alighted directly in front of Nelse. It jumped for his throat before he could deliver a blow with his axe. He drew his knife, and by a lucky thrust buried it in the panther's heart. It was more than lucky, for the panther's forepaws were on his breast, and its wide open jaws at his throat. In falling back it set its claws in the hunter's clothing, and tore them from him from the shoulders down. Leaving the panther in its death throes, Crocker hastened to the spot where he had thrown his rifle, and found it. He lost no time in loading it, for he knew that it was more than likely that the dying cries of the panther would summon others to the spot, and he had barely got his rifle ready before he heard one springing from a tree toward him. It soon came in sight, and, discovering Crocker, crouched for a spring in the crotch of a tree, a few feet away. Nelse waited for the leap, and as the panther left the tree he fired. The ball entered its heart, and the animal fell dead at Crocker's feet.

"Nelse's dog, probably unable to face his master after deserting him twice in a strait, had disappeared, and Crocker never saw him again. Finding himself thus left to combat panthers alone, Nelse concluded it would be best to let the ones still remaining have the swamp to themselves, so he took the skins of the three panthers he had killed and broke camp. Crocker signed the temperance pledge in Monticello in 1843, and did not drink anything until the fall of 1844. He joined a party on a hunt that fall, and they had plenty of rum in the camp. Nelse got drunk and remained so for a week. When he became sober he was so ashamed that he shot himself in camp.

"Another hunting story that made a deep impression on my mind in that old backwoods tavern was about a man named Dodge who was a great panther hunter. He was driving a deer once near one of the ponds of Sullivan county, and was walking along the edge of the pond, when he discovered a panther glaring at him from a tree and making ready to spring. Quick as a flash he had his rifle to his shoulder and before the panther had time to spring he sent a bullet in its brain. The panther fell dead and rolled into the pond. The echoes of the shot had hardly died away when the woods seemed literally alive with companions of the dead beast. Dodge said he saw them leaping about in the trees on all sides. He knew that he had no possible chance for his life in a contest with such numbers unless he could obtain some advantage which they could not overcome. It suddenly occurred to him that no member of the cat family would enter water under any circumstances, so he waded out into the pond until he was waist deep. He counted seven panthers leaping about in the trees, uttering blood-curdling yells, and glaring at the hunter. From his position in the pond Dodge would shoot at a panther whenever one would rush down to the edge of the woods. He killed four, when the other three retreated into the woods and disappeared. Fearing that they had gone after reinforcements, Dodge made all haste to get to his cabin. The next day, in company with another hunter, he followed the remaining three and succeeded in killing two of them.

"But panther stories were not the only ones those hunters of the olden time used to tell. Wolves, bears, and wounded bucks furnished subjects for endless tales of backwoods prowess. If that old tavern were standing now, and its walls would speak, the life of Davy Crockett would be as tame as a dictionary alongside of the tales they could unfold."

The Martyrdom of St. Peter.

The notion of the Apostles crucifixion head downwards is derived from a passing allusion in Origen, and seems to contradict an expression of Tertullian. It was possibly suggested by an erroneous translation of some Latin expression for capital punishment. At any rate, it stands condemned as a sentimental anachronism, bearing on its front the traces of later and more morbid forms of piety rather than the simple humility of the Apostles, who rejoined in all things to imitate their Lord. Those who accept these legends must do so on the authority of an heretical novel, written with an evil tendency, not earlier than the beginning of the third century; or else on that of the aprocryphal "Acta Petri et Pauli," which appeared at a still later date. All that we can really learn about the closing years of St. Peter from the earliest Fathers may be summed up in a few words, that in all probability he was martyred at Rome. That he died by martyrdom may be regarded as certain, because, apart from tradition, it seems to be implied in the words of the risen Christ to his penitent Apostle. That this martyrdom took place at Rome, though first asserted by Tertullian and Gaius at the beginning of the third century, may (in the absence of any rival tradition) be accepted as a fact in spite of the ecclesiastical tendencies which might have led to its invention; but the only Scriptural authority which can be quoted for any visit of St. Peter to Rome is the one word, "The Church in Babylon saluteth you."

Chinese Composition.

The Chinese compositor has a merry time while working. One would imagine he was on a six-day-go-as-you-please walking match instead of setting type. He cannot sit at the case as our printers do, but must constantly travel from one case to another, as the characters needed are so numerous and cover so much space that it is impossible to keep them in anything like the room required for the ordinary cases. In setting up a piece of copy the Chinese printer will waltz up and down the room for a few moments, and then go down-stairs for a line of lower-case. Then he takes the elevator and goes up into the third storey after some caps, and then out into the wood shed after some astonishers. Intelligence in his case is not so much a requisite as being a good pedestrian.

THE SHAKERS.

How the Disciples of Mother Ann Lee Live and Thrive — Their Parent Settlement—Property held by the Community for the Benefit of All.

What are known as the Shaker settlements are situated seven miles northwest of Albany, in the town of Watervliet, N. Y. There are four villages clustered together, distant from each other about half a mile. The principal settlement is called the "Church" village. The church in which all the members worship in common is located here. The other three villages are known as the "North," "South," and "West." The names indicate their direction from the Church settlement. Each community holds its own property and controls its own temporal affairs. In religious matters the four settlements are controlled by the pastor of the church, though each has one "presiding elder." The land held by the four communities forms a total of 3,000 acres. Some of it is woodland and a small portion of it is marshy. There are no hills of prominence, and generally the land is level, fertile, and cultivated with extreme care. The land owned by the Church village comprises 769 acres.

The term village is rather a misnomer here. Ordinarily it conveys the idea of a greater number of dwellings, streets, a tavern, and some signs of public business. The buildings which compose the Church settlement number twenty or thirty about. They form a sort of square or court. There is nothing which at all represents a travelled highway. Nor do these building appear like dwellings, as they serve various other and different purposes. The first, which stands near the public road, is a neat and substantial structure. This contains the office, the "store," and reception-room. Here Samantha Bowie, Barbara Hooper, and Ella Benedict preside as hosts, and receive the public gracefully and graciously. In the store various articles of home manufacture are exposed for sale. Basketwork, needlework, mats, canes, etc., represent the patience and deft hand labor of these interesting people. The female costume, like that at the Oneida community, is peculiar to themselves. It consists of a dress with long kilted skirt of black alpaca and a cape of the same material. This, with a white apron and a bonnet-frame for the head, covered with white goods, makes up a neat and effective indoor costume. The general appearance of the women here, with the white apron omitted, is not unlike that of the Sisters of Charity. When the women folks go to Troy and Albany on business they wear the straw bonnet and cape which is known to the female creation everywhere as a "shaker." The men wear no peculiar or distinctive costume. Theirs is that of society at large.

The members of the Church family number about fifty. The total of the four villages is not more than 150. Two-thirds of the whole number are females. All, or the major portion, of the Church family sleep and eat in one large building. The sleeping rooms are divided, the male from the female, by a long hall. The meals are taken at a long table in silence, and with strict decorum. A bell on top of this building gets the members out of bed at 4:30 a.m. in the summer and at 5 a.m. in the winter. It summons them to breakfast at 6, to dinner at 12, to supper at 6. The male members do very little manual labor. They superintend the outdoor work, which is mostly performed by hired help. About twenty hired men are employed, at a salary of $200 a year, with board. Although some Jersey and Holsteins are raised, no effort is made to rear thoroughbred cattle. The women are engaged in tailoring, mending, making shirts and other garments for family wear. Brooms are also made here, and small pails. The buildings, aside from the church, the office, the house, and the seed store, are devoted to factory or workshop purposes on a small scale.

Those familiar with the Oneida community can not avoid making comparisons. Though the latter and the Shakers bear a general resemblance one to the other, yet they are unlike in some particulars, and in one point are as dissimilar as the antipodes. Before Oneida community resolved itself into a stock company and conformed to the state marriage laws its members were "free lovers." Their peculiar and abhorrent practices were a part of their creed. The Shakers' faith is based upon the plan of property in common, but also upon "the practice of living a strictly virgin, celibate life." The Oneida community contains more members and has immense trap-shops, silk-works, blooded stock, barns, and a canning factory. The Shaker settlement have none of these. They may lack the collective vigor and talent for business and manufacture which formerly characterized the Oneida community under the leadership of J. H. Noyes, the founder. There is no pretense here to landscape gardening; no handsome lawns, or flower-beds, or museums. The buildings are not unlike in general character those of the ordinary farm sort. There is more evidence of simplicity and contentedness than of an ambitious desire to pose before the world.

This is the parent Shaker settlement. Mother Ann Lee went from England to New England in 1774. She claimed to have received a revelation and a commission from Christ to form a kingdom of Christ on earth. In this kingdom the sexes were to dwell together in virgin purity. She had been the mother of four children, all of whom died in infancy. Odd as her theory was, she brought with her from England seven converts. In witchcraft New England she met with no favor. Then, with a society numbering ten members, she wandered into the wilderness here in Albany county about the year 1780. The first church was built in New Lebanon, Columbia county, in 1785. In 1795 the society appeared under the name of "The United Society of Believers of Christ's Second Appearing." Now there are seventeen societies in the United States. There are none in any other part of the globe. The common name "Shakers" was applied to these people in derision, and, like many another, the epithet stuck until it has ceased to be opprobrious as was at first intended. In their religious services the worshippers, when moved by the Spirit, shake or dance. They hold public services in the church on Sunday, beginning at 10 a.m. The public services held last Sunday were the first held this season. These occasions attract large numbers of sightseers from this city, from Troy, Cohoes, Waterford, Lansingburg, and West Troy. Some of the public who attend these servicers are scoffers and disturbers of the peace. They march about the aisles of the church and in circles with a step that is a short of shuffle, accompanied by a rocking and a shaking of the body. The members, like the Quakers, speak when the spirit moves them to do so. Ann Lee is buried in the Shaker cemetery here, in which rest the dead belonging to all the villages.

Gardening is the principal employment of the Shakers, though all sorts of farming are carried on. The recent severe frosts utterly ruined nine thousand of the finest early tomato plants. These can not be replaced. Tomatoes, apples, and other fruits are canned here by the Shakers for the Oneida community. More than half a century ago the Shakers first originated the drying of sweet corn for food, and they first raised, papered, and vended garden seeds in the present styles. From their first methods of preparing medicinal roots and herbs for market sprung the immense patent medicine trade. They began the broom-corn business. The first buzz-saw was made by the Shakers at New Lebanon. This is now in the Albany Geological hall. The Shakers here at Watervliet invented the metallic pens, first made of brass and silver. All distilled liquors were abandoned as a beverage by the Shakers sixty years ago, and during the past forty years no fermented liquor of any sort has been used except as a medicine. Pork and tobacco are also numbered among the "forbidden articles." Though the Shakers are not strict vegetarians, the amount of meat and grease used as food is reduced to the minimum.

Males and females are "not allowed to touch each other unnecessarily nor to hold secret correspondence." The Shakers claim to be anti-Mormon and anti Onedian. Before a new member is admitted he or she must confess all sin in the presence of an elder or an elderess and confessor. Married and single persons are admitted on conforming to the requirements. What property they bring goes voluntarily into the common fund. Sometimes a member "backslides." As Philip Smith, one of the managers, said: 'They come and go." When a member "backslides" he or she may return, if no serious objection be made. Children with their parents are received with reluctance. They are educated in the common school, branches and are given trades. In the officebulding members receives visits from relatives and acquaintances belong to the outside world. These friends are permitted to remain for days or weeks, though indiscriminate intercourse with "worldlings" is discouraged.

Shakers point with pride to their mortality record, which testifies to their longevity. The average age at death in the seventeen societies, embracing nearly five thousand persons, is 57½ years. "Aunt Dolly," who recently died at Mount Lebanon, was 108 years old. She had been a Shaker nearly all her life. The only peculiarity noticeable in a Shaker's speech is the omission of the final letter in "yes." It is odd at first to hear "ye" instead of the usual affirmative. It is a corruption of the Quaker "yea," perhaps. As one of the Shakers observed to the writer, "It takes all sorts of people to make a world."

An Island of Cocoanuts and Bananas.

Bonacca is an island and in its way is one of the liveliest places in Spanish Hoaduras. Its liveliness, however, is peculiar to itself, and there are few places like it. The island has two uses. It grows excellent bananas and cocoanuts and affords a refuge for all the flies of the surrounding islands.

There are many bananas raised at Bonacca, but they do not run so large as on the mainland; the cocoanuts do splendidly. Indeed, it is to encourage the cocoanut growers that the fruit men take their bananas. At present there is a sort of a boom in the cocoanut business, and many are starting cocoanut plantations, or "cocoa-nut walks," as they are called here. It is a safe investment of money, but the return is slow. The trees are planted along the sea-shore in a sandy soil mixed with loam. From the time a tree is planted it takes seven years before it is sufficiently large to bear nuts. But just as soon as the cocoanuts form on the trees then a steady income sets in. The average number of cocoanuts to a tree is 120 per year. In the best places trees will bear 150 per year. They are sold according to the season of the year, from $16 to $20 per thousand. Our captain was paying $20 per thousand for good nuts. The cocoanut walk needs hardly any care. When ripe the nuts fall off themselves, and all that is necessary is to pick them up. The husking of cocoanuts is the most tiresome work on a plantation, but the native inhabitants are very skillful at it, and they charge very little for their services. After being husked the cocoanuts are piled up, and when the first steamer arrives are loaded into dories and paddled to the ship. As they are passed up the sides they are counted, and a check given immediately to the planter, who on going to the captain or purser receives his money in Mexican dollars or Honduran money. The whole business is conducted on a cash basis. There are plenty of small islands which can be bought cheap for cash on which there are now sufficient trees to pay for the money invested in a short time, as well as to support the planter while waiting for his new trees to grow.

The cocoanut industry is increasing every year, while the demand for the nuts in New York and New Orleans is always equal to the supply. The usual method of a planter who comes into this country to start a new plantation is to begin with the banana. Nine months after the banana sucker is planted a yield is obtained. The young shoots are planted eighteen or twenty feet apart, and between them a cocoanut tree is placed. The heavy growth of the banana shades the young plant until it is well rooted, when it soon shoots up ahead. The soil is so rich that banana and cocoanut will soon interfere. Then the banana suckers are cut down and the trees kept clean. Thus, while the planter lives upon and makes a profit from his bananas, the future fortune in cocoanuts is rapidly nearing its consummation. There is little trouble in making plantations in this country. Land costs nothing, and large concessions may be obtained from the Honduran government.

LEPROSY.

Alleged Increase of the Disease on the Pacific Coast—A Situation of Affairs Which is Appalling in San Francisco.

The increase of leprosy in this city is beginning to attract more than usual attention, says a San Francisco letter. There is a cry for some systematic method on the part of the authorities whereby the disease may be kept off but up to this time the board of health, although devising the proper methods for preventing the landing of lepers, have not paid sufficient attention to the cases already here. A careful investigation shows that the cases already in this city may be numbered by the hundreds.

At one hospital there are now twenty Asiatic lepers and one from Hawaii. Besides eight cases have been shipped to China. Of the large number of cases already here the majority are engaged in just such work as will aid in spreading the disease, such as the manufacture of cigars, the manufacture of shirts, and as cooks for Caucasians. The afflicted people are aware of the danger they may follow the spread of their disease, and are using all kinds of devises to conceal their condition from the authorities. Sometimes they succeed for a while in eluding detection by the lynx-eyed inspectors but finally they are tracked. If they conceal the filthy and painful sores and scabs which always accompany the disease from view they are safe. The whites, strange to say, consider themselves but little concern, but the fear of their own race are in most dread of the disease. The afflicted Cuinaman is shunned to a degree that partakes almost of the character of inhumanity, so far as his countrymen are concerned. When reduced to a condition of almost utter helplessness, the sick are removing the victim by means of poison, then entertained by his fellow countrymen who have escaped the evil. Some of the cases of leprosy to be seen in this city are of such a disgusting character as to cause a shudder even to those who have passed over a battlefield or are familiar with hospital work. How these poor beings are shunned by those of their own blood, how they are put out of sight and allowed to rot to death as it were, are facts not to be denied. Reduced to this condition, the leper thus forsaken by all the world, is not infrequently carried to some out-of-the-way place where he occasionally is gladdened and revived by a draught of water from the hand of some compassionate member of his family, but in the majority of instances even this boon is denied him and he is allowed to die by inches, his life being terminated by poison.

In this city the probabilities of a spread of leprosy are undoubtedly greater than in any other city in the world. Among the later arrivals from Hawaii is a young man who is now confined at the Twenty-second street hospital. Her case is a peculiar one and her recovery is considered doubtful. Molokai, one of the Sandwich islands, is a regular settlement for lepers, and it was proposed to send this young woman there for treatment. She escaped however, and in pursuit, and determined to make her way to this city. No one suspected her true condition. Her fellow-passengers on the steamer to San Francisco did not detect the slightest traces of her disease. She mingled freely with those on board and was considered the belle of the ship. When the vessel neared San Francisco someone recognized the girl and notified the authorities, who made an effort to prevent her landing which was accomplished after quite a struggle. She is now in the hospital and will probably not survive many days.

At Honolulu the idea has gained ground that San Francisco is a most desirable place for lepers. The rigid and somewhat cruel treatment to which patients are subjected on the Molokai settlement has driven the lepers to seek other fields, and the ease with which they are permitted to land on our shores has been heralded at home. This has followed somewhat of a stampede by an army of lepers to come hitherward by every steamer. A gentleman who recently witnessed the departure of a vessel from Honolulu for Molokai informed me that the scene was the most terrible one he had ever witnessed. There were about sixty cases bound for Molokai. Some of them were simply masses of rottenness and filth. The steamer was a small one and the patients were crowded into a narrow space. The farewells of the relatives who had come to bid a last adieu to their stricken kinsmen was a pitiful sight for it was known to a certainty that not one of the lepers would ever leave Molokai alive.

The medical fraternity of Honolulu has so far made but little progress in their attempts to ward off the disease. Some of them assert that the disease is simply a stage of syphilis. Others do not share in this belief. It is conceded that there is quite a resemblance in leprosy and tertiary syphilis. The leprosy of Hawaii and that of Asia are pronounced to be totally unlike.

On Feb 13 there were thirteen cases of leprosy in the hospital here, and at the present time there are twenty-three. Its further spread depends upon the vigilance of the authorities, and they doubtless will take such action as may be required in dealing with this terrible scourge.

The Great Canal.

It is now proposed to join the Bay of Biscay with the Mediterranean Sea by means of a great ship canal, which will save the voyage around the Spanish peninsula. This would be a work second in importance only to the Suez Canal itself, for all the vessels from England and Northern Europe would be forced to use this new means of communication. It would be a gigantic work, but it would certainly pay in time. In the meantime the Panama canal is being vigorously prosecuted by M. de Lesseps. This is a mighty work, for it aims to join the Atlantic oceans by a great ship canal cut through Central America. A vast amount of work has been done, and the most gigantic efforts are being made to finish this extraordinary channel by the close of 1888. But it seems that only 1-60 of the dredging, 1-50 of rock cutting, and 1-15 (2,967,000 metres) of the earth of excavation had been completed on the first of March last. The important supplementary work, the Chagres Dam, is not yet begun. There is reason to fear the canal will not be finished before 1901. Of the 600,000,000 francs subscribed for, 300,000,000 have been spent in preliminaries and plant, and 100,000,000 in purchasing and improving the railway. It is supposed that 600,000,000 more of francs will be required to complete the work.

The place man occupies in this world takes the hue of his character.

SENTENCED TO SIBERIA.

[...]'s Experience between his Arrest in Kief and his Escape in Irkutsk.

[At] midnight on Feb. 11, 1879, in the city [of Kief], Mrs. Kossarovsky's house, then oc[cupie]d by the Nihilist brothers Ivichevitch, [was] regularly besieged and captured by the [gendar]mes at the point of bayonets. They [fought] desperately on both sides. The gen[darmes] were ordered to take the conspira[tors'] headquarters at any cost, and the Ni[hilists] were determined to defend them[selves] to the last shot. One door after an[other] was broken in, but not before each was [turne]d into a sieve by the shots fired from [both] sides. Capt. Sudeikin and his men [wore] suits of chain mail, yet a gendarme [was] killed on the spot, and several were [wou]nded. Both brothers Ivichevitch were [mor]tally wounded. N. Brantner and an[othe]r friend were seriously wounded. The [cons]pirators were overpowered, arrested, [and b]rought to the police headquarters.

[On] the same night in another house I was [arre]sted and brought to the same police [build]ing. In what a plight I beheld my [comr]ades there! N. Posen and B. Steblin[-Kame]nsky were standing with their arms [tight]ly bound behind their backs and held [by g]endarmes. In a corner of the same [room] were sitting Miss Armfeld, Miss Pat[...], and P. Sarandovitch, all bound and [...]. The room was filled with police[men] and armed gendarmes. Amid a roar of [...] there suddenly appeared the gigantic [figure] of our brave comrade, known under [the ass]umed name of Antonoff. He was [drag]ging behind him two policemen who [tried] to hold him by his arms. Never can [I for]get his appearance. Pale was his face, [flash]ing his eyes, disordered his black, [curly] hair, and trembling his frame from [head] to foot.

"What is that?" he thundered, pointing at [...] and Kamensky. "Arms tied! Away [with] the ropes!"

"[Pl]ease calm yourself," said the police [capta]in, "we will untie them."

[Inst]antly the ropes were taken away.

"Water! I want a drink!" roared An[tonoff].

"[Br]ing water at once," commanded the [capta]in. Presently a colonel of gendarmes [arriv]ed, and ordered that each of us [shoul]d be taken to a separate cell.

"[U]se your swords and bayonets in case of [need]," said the colonel to the gendarmes.

[On] the next day we were transferred to [the fo]rtress where scores of our friends had [been] pining for years, waiting for the "quick [and ju]st trial" which has been solemnly pro[mise]d by the Czar Alexander. Of course, [we] were

[SU]BJECTED TO SOLITARY CONFINEMENT.

[How]ever, we kept up a lively correspon[dence]. We telegraphed to one another by [knocki]ng on the wall. Occasionally we [manage]d to each other in cipher. The fort[ress] authorities tried in vain to hinder us [from] talking in one way or another. In [...] we were tried by the military court. [We] were not allowed, though we had the [right] by law, to chose our own counsel, we [decide]d not to take any part whatsoever in [the sh]am trial.

[Thr]ee of our party of fifteen—Antonoff, [...]tner, and Ossinsky—were condemned to [death], and the rest to hard labor in the Si[berian] mines for fourteen years and ten [month]s. When the sentence of death was [pronou]nced a lady prisoner swooned. The [specta]tors who packed the hall were greatly [moved]; curiosity prompted some to stand [on] the benches.

"[W]hat do you stare at?" thundered An[tonoff] with his eyes flaming. "For shame, [is thi]s a spectacle of this thing!" The peo[ple fe]ll back and turned to the exit.

[After] the trial we condemned prisoners—[those] who were to die and those destined [for S]iberia—were allowed to pass a part of [the] day together. It is impossible to des[cribe] our feelings. On the eve of the execu[tion] of our three friends we bade them a last [good]by. I must say that on that moment[ous ev]ening the three who were about to [die t]ried their best to cheer the rest of us. [Antono]ff was anxious about only one thing [—tha]t his proper name would not be dis[close]d. He loved his mother dearly, and [wished] that she might remain ignorant of [his fa]te. It is hardly necessary to say that [all th]ree died bravely.

[Soo]n after that we were sent to eastern [Siberi]a. The two of us who did not belong [to the] nobility were sent on foot, like the [rest o]f the unprivileged criminals. Their [heads] were half shaved, and heavy chains [were] put on their feet. According to the [law t]he noblemen do not lose their privil[eges] until they reach their destination in [Siberi]a, and so some of us drove in rude [carts]. Our heads were not shaved, and [we we]re free from chains. All, however, [were] dressed alike. We had caftans of a [coarse] gray cloth, with two diamond shap[ed ye]llow patches on our backs to signify [that] we were sentenced to hard labor. The [politica]l exiles proper wore only an ace of [diamon]ds. From Kieff we went by rail[way] in a special prison car, accompanied by [gendar]mes. Thus we passed Orel, Moscow, [and re]ached Nijni-Novgorod. Then we were [place]d in a barge, which was towed by a [steame]r to Perm. Then again we went by [railwa]y up to Ecaterinburg. After that [there] was before us the famous Siberian [road]. It is a common post route, with [its] telegraph wires stretched on one side. [These] wires lead to the very shores of the [Pacific]. Each of us noblemen had a troika, [and ea]ch was accompanied by two armed [gendar]mes. From Kieff to Ecaterinburg we [had n]o chance to look upon the world ex[cept] through iron bars and nets, but now [we c]ould enjoy the view with no obstacle [befo]re our eyes. What a joy it was for me! [It w]as if freedom was returning to me. [Ever] since the first day of my arrest the [idea] of attempting to escape never left my [mind]. But now that I looked upon the free [w]orld the thought turned into a burn[ing des]ire which controlled all my actions. [Once] in the night when the gendarmes were [asleep] at my side, I took the cap from one [of them], and

[T]RIED TO PULL OUT HIS PISTOL.

[Had I] succeeded in getting that pistol I [would] have tried my legs, but the gen[darme] awoke, and I parted for the time with [my ha]ppy dream.

[We] made two hundred miles and reached [Tiume]n. From that town up to Tomsk we [were] taken along with hundreds of common [criminal]s in a barge. We ran up the Ob. [The] prisoners called our barge a poultry [cage], because it was covered with a solid [iron n]et. The prisoners were packed in the [barge] like herrings in a box. We, the polit[ical] prisoners, were allowed to walk occasionally on the deck. In this manner we journeyed 2,700 [...] From Tomsk to Krasnoiarsk we travelled 500 versts on the troikas, and from there to Irkutsk we had to go by the etape system. One thousand versts were thus journeyed in two months. In our party there were 170 persons. There were robust men, hearty women, babies, and the aged. The etape system is arranged in this way: All the prisoners were put into two lines. Then followed wagons with the women and children and the prisoner's luggage. Then followed two troikas of the noble exiles, and three troikas of the political criminals closed the procession. An officer and thirty soldiers forming a kind of chain around our party. Fifteen miles was a regular day's tramp. Then all stopped in the prison for the night. After two days of walking a day was allowed for rest. The houses are divided into four unequal parts, to wit, a large hall for male prisoners, a family room, a room for noblemen, and the guards room. Of cleanliness and comfort in any of the rooms there was absolutely none.

Besides the officers and the soldiers two men play an important role in the prisoner's life. Each group of prisoners elects from among themselves the elder, who serves in the common interest, representing the others before the authorities, and keeping the prisoners funds. That elder is a kind of guardian angel to the prisoners. But then there is an angel of quite a different character. This is the tradesman who keeps a store and a club for the prisoners. He is a prisoner who outbids his competitors for his privilege. He keeps for sale tea, sugar, tobacco, candles, cards, &c., Each prisoners receive ten topecks, or five cents each day. The officer turns the money over to the elder, who distributes it among the prisoners. On entering the heap house and being counted over the prisoners are let free, Whereupon they make a lively rush, each one scrambling for a good sleeping place. He who gets a bed of plain boards is deemed lucky, and whoever secures a place under such a bed is also contented. The remainder sleep on the floor.

Before bedtime the prisoners make fires in the yard and prepare their porridge and tea. This forms a unique scene. Scores of wood piles burn brightly in the yard, and around each the prisoners swarm, adjusting their iron tea kettles and stirring porridge. Here and there men are taking off their worn out boots, unwrapping their feet, and examining their chains, which often cause bad sores. Some of the prisoners deftly remove their irons altogether, and others, assisted by specialists, try to smoothen the leg rings or even to stretch them so much that the foot will easily pass through. Here are two men ready to fight and there is a group cautiously whispering, discussing some conspiracy. Presently a song, "Down the mother Volga," is heard. A young prisoner possessing a melodious and strong voice pours his very soul into that favorite Russian ballad. The prisoners' camp is hushed at once. Everybody drinks in that melody, and happy reminiscences of the past, of wives, sisters, sweethearts, mothers, companions, and children, chase one another through these saddened minds. Some of the men, though rough looking, show tear dampened eyes.

IT IS A SACRED MOMENT.

Even the guard sent to order the prisoners to bed, stops as if petrified, his heart melted by the familiar air.

Many of them do not care to sleep. Here and there they light candles and play cards. But the tradesman's corner is the liveliest spot. There piles of coppers constantly appear on the table and as rapidly disappear. The prisoners play for cash, and occasionally the tradesman advances a few copecks, under the guarantee that he will get the prisoners share next day. Sometimes the play is for the "Government things," that is to say, the prison clothes are pawned, and the wretched man sacrifices his necessities to his passion. The further we went into Siberia the harder it was to move on. The men grew tired, and many fell sick. Bread was dear, and the "hunger typhus" was spreading in our party. As the etap hospitals were far apart, we were compelled to carry our sick and dying patients. Now there were stranger scenes in the resting places. In one corner men gambled, in another a story teller provoked paroxysms of laughter; here was heard a merry song, and there came forth the last groans of a dying man. But it was only the world on a miniature scale.

On the route we often met with runaways. The guards did not bother with them. Some times conversations were held between the runaways and the prisoners.

"Halo, Ivan, you are again in the regulars!" a runaway would remark.

"Hallo, Semen! are you not satisfied with free board?" a prisoner retorts.

"I say, Semen, you are a good running horse," puts in a jester, "yet you will not escape his Majesty's stables."

The condition of the political prisoners was far better than that of the capital criminals. The political prisoners got 15 copecks per day, rode in waggons, and had a separate room for themselves. It was the Government order that the political prisoners should be kept quite apart from the others. But on the journey that order was not always executed. Every evening in the houses the prisoners of all grades came together. It is a common practice for the prisoners to exchange sentences. A man condemned to settlement assumes for some payment the name and fate of his fellow sentenced to hard labor for a long period. I engaged an exile, a robber, to assume my role for a pair of hunter's boots, a flannel shirt, and eight roubles ($4). I am told that in our party twenty exchanges took place. Yet the guards and the authorities knew nothing about it. As a rule, the prisoners do not betray one another. My new role and that of my substitute were bothersome. I was a medical student, a political criminal and a nobleman; and he was a peasant, hardly able to sign his name. But if I could drag his irons, he, too, could support my reputation. Once our officer was taken ill, and as he knew that one of the prisoners of his command had studied medicine, he called upon me, that is, upon my substitute to treat him. My substitute did it well.

Toward the end of October we reached the city of Irkutsk, where the prisoners are usually classified. Those condemned to settlement are sent to their new home, those condemned to hard labor are distributed among various mines. My substitute and I passed the final examination, and each went his own way, never to meet again.

On the second day we exiles, or settlers, were turned over to the village authorities. We were particularly free. My companions went to a liquor shop to celebrate the happy event. I resolved to make the best possible use of my freedom by running away from Siberia. I had sold some of my things and realized about 75 cents, which money I determined must support me during a week. I had to travel 140 miles to reach the residence of a trusted friend. Profiting by the lessons of the old runaways, I made my way successfully, though the gendarmes were after me. It was in November. Snow was on the ground. Whenever I hid myself in any bushes I reach them by and thus, perhaps, I misled my persecutors. My friend secreted me in his country place for two months.

On the etape road I made the acquaintance of many old runaways, who gave me the knowledge needed for becoming a successful tramp. In Siberia there are about thirty thousand runaways tramping as the sun does, westward to Russia. The villagers treat them well as long as they do not injure property or otherwise misbehave. Otherwise they hunt them like wild beasts. Yet, if a runaway is badly handled by villagers without just cause, the runaways pledge themselves to have revenge. Incendiarism is meted out for the whole village and death for the individuals. I am told that in the Irkutsk province there was a native who made it his business to hunt fugitives. "If you kill a squirrel," he used to say, "you earn only fifteen copecks, but kill a runaway and you are sure of earning fifty copecks at least, for his dress costs that sum." That brute was in turn killed by runaways.

A professional runaway, Beloff, who for twenty-five years has tramped Siberia eastward and westward, from the Ural Mountains to the island of Saghalien, told me that for many years it was impossible to escape from Saghalien, because the Guilaks, the natives, used to kill every fugitive they saw. At last a party of runaways, thirty strong and well armed, banded together for their freedom and revenge. They ransacked several Guilak settlements and killed everybody in them, after that the Guilaks ceased to hunt runaways.

When my health was restored I started back to Russia in the most dignified manner. I went by the official post road, changing one troika after another. My pass was all right, except that it belonged to a retired officer recently dead. In May, 1881 I reached Geneva.

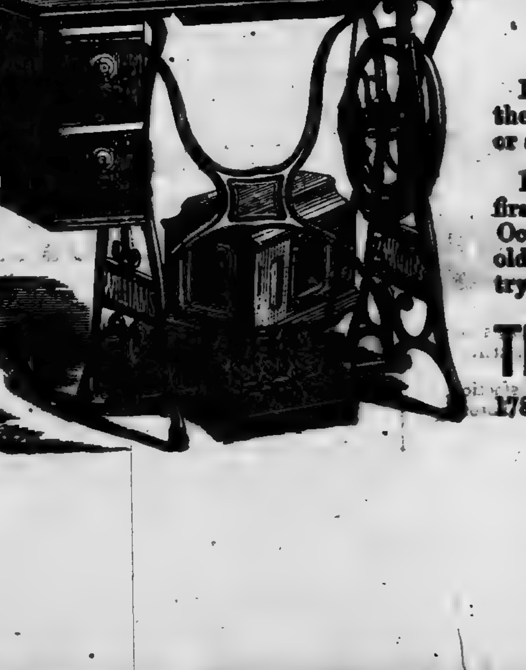
CONBOY'S CARRIAGE TOPS



is one of the best. Not that a carriage top is nice, but the great want of something more perfect than the heavy, expensive, inconvenient tops in use, suggested the invention of the Conboy adjustable top, which has been altered and improved until it now stands without a rival. The styles and grades now manufactured are the most popular, and are varied enough to suit all tastes. Mr. Conboy is the Pioneer in the business. It has been his aim since the commencement to merit the patronage and confidence of the trade and the public, by producing durable and convenient, and at the same time, elegant and stylish tops, that could be sold at exceedingly low prices. That this end has been attained is abundantly proved by the thousands sold, and the numerous letters received from the leading carriage builders through the country. Since moving to Toronto, Mr. Conboy is giving his whole aim to the improvement and manufacture of carriage tops, where his increased facilities, his practical knowledge as a carriage builder, and his numerous patented improvements, give him great advantage over all competitors.

SAW MILL AND TIMBER LAND FOR SALE OR TO LET

In the Township of Artemesia, County of Grey, 4 miles from Flesherton Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The mill is situated at Little Falls, in a block of about 400 acres timber and, with other timber land surrounding. The building is substantially built on stone foundation. The machinery is all good and driven with great power by a 23 inch Leffell wheel, under 36 ft. head of water. There are one large circular saw for cutting logs, 2 small circulars for sawing lath and broom handles, 1 guage lathe for turning broom handles, etc., 1 shingle machine with jointer and packer complete. The water power is excellent, the stream being very regular. There are several other good mill sites on the proyerty. The land in valley is considered the best in the country. The place would make an excellent stock farm when the timber is taken off.

This offers a good opportunity for a practical, energetic man to go into this kind of business, as the place will be sold or let on liberal terms.

The bush is so convenient to the mill logs can be trucked in summer time. Immediate possession given.

Garfield.

A fine monument will soon be completed over the remains of the late President Garfield. Few men ever in public life in the United States were so deserving of some lasting national monument. As a citizen he was an examplary one to every young man in the nation, rising as he did by his own energy and industry to the highest possible position, and all the way along his public life keeping his personal reputation untarnished, and earning at one and the same time an honourable reputation both as a Christian and as a politician. The pity is that so few men of real principle become the principal men in public affairs. As a President Garfield was firm and conscientious, and no doubt this firmness in resisting the unreasonable demands of the machine politicians of the Conkling stamp cost him his life in the end. The patient manner in which he passed the last sad days of his life were worthy of the end of any Christian.

Beer Drinking.

The Scientific American is certainly a very ably conducted journal, and is considered excellent authority on all subjects of which it treats. The following article from its pages on beer drinking is commended to the careful consideration of those who are inclined to look so favorable on the general use of this "harmless beverage."

For some years a decided inclination has been apparent all over the country to give up the use of whisky and other strong alcohols, using as a substitute beer and other compounds. This is evidently founded on the idea that beer is not harmful, and contains a large amount of nutriment; also that bitters may have some medical quality, which will neutralize the alcohol which it conceals, etc. These theories are without confirmation in the observation of physicians. The use of beer is found to produce a species of degeneration of all the organism; profound and deceptive. Fatty deposits, diminished circulation, conditions of congestion, and perversion of functional activities, local inflammations of both the liver and kidneys are constantly present. Intellectually, a stupor amounting almost to paralysis arrests the reason, changing all the higher faculties into a mere animalism, sensual, selfish sluggish, varied only with paroxysms of anger that are senseless and brutal. In appearance the beer drinker may be the picture of health, but in reality he is most incapable of resisting disease. A slight injury, a severe cold, or shock to the body or mind, will commonly provoke acute disease ending fatally. Compared with inebriates who use different kinds of alcohol, he is more incurable, and more generally diseased. The constant use of beer every day gives the system no recuperation but steadily lowers the vital forces. It is our observation that beer drinking in this country produces the very lowest kind of inebriety, closely allied to criminal insanity. The most dangerous class of ruffians in our large cities are beer drinkers. It is asserted by competent authority that the evils of heredity are more positive in this class than from other alcoholics. Recourse to beer as a substitute for other forms of alcohol merely increases the danger and fatality. In bitters we have a drink which can never become general; its chief danger will be in strengthening the disordered craving, which latter will develop the positive disease. Public sentiment and legislation should comprehend that all forms of alcohol are dangerous when used.

Poetry.

A Saxon Proverb.

There is a jolly Saxon proverb,
That is very much like this,
That a man is half in heaven
When he has a woman's kiss;
But there's danger in delaying,
And the sweetness may forsake it,
So I tell you, bashful lover,
If you want a kiss why take it.

Never let another fellow
Steal a march on you in this:
Never let a laughing maiden
See you spoiling for a kiss;
There's a royal way to kissing,
And the jolly ones who make it
Have a motto that is winning—
If you want a kiss, why take it.

Any fool may face a cannon,
Anybody wear a crown;
But a man must win a woman,
If he'd have her for his own;
Would you have the golden apple,
You must find the tree and shake it,
If the thing is worth the having,
And you want a kiss, why take it.

Who would burn upon a desert
With a forest smiling by?
Who would give his sunny summer
For a bleak and winter sky?
Oh! I tell you there is magic,
And you cannot, cannot brake it,
For the sweetest part of loving,
Is to want a kiss, and take it.

NOTICE

Cattle at Large.

Notice is hereby given that all horses, sheep, swine or other cattle found straying near the line of the Ontario Division of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in contravention of the Railway Act, will be impounded. All parties therefore are cautioned to prevent their cattle from straying. The following clauses of the Railway Act are those bearing upon the subject.

"No horses, sheep, swine or other cattle shall be permitted to be at large upon any highway within half a mile of the intersection of such highway with any Railway on grade, unless such cattle are in charge of some person or persons to prevent their loitering or stopping on such highway at such intersection."

"All cattle found at large in contravention of the last preceding section may, by any person finding the same at large, be impounded in the nearest pound to the place where the same are so found, and the poundkeeper with whom the same are so impounded shall detain the same in like manner, and subject to the like regulations as to the care and disposal thereof, as in the case of cattle impounded for trespass on private property."

"No person, any of whose cattle being at large contrary to the provisions of the section aforesaid, are killed by any train at such point of intersection, shall have any action against any Railway Company in respect to the same being so killed."

Cutting Their Own Throats.

The Hamilton Times says:—The Globe claims that it has won in the strike, but the Mail still looks very sick. The proprietors of both Globe and Mail have been playing the fool for a long time. They sell their weekly editions at less than cost, in a foolish and hoggish endeavor to drive the country papers to the wall. They send evening editions to Hamilton and other cities, to be sold for less than the cost of the white paper, and the people buy them for wrapping paper. Lately, one of the rivals reduced the price of advertisements, and the other has been publishing advertisements for nothing. Having cut their own throats till their heads are nearly severed from their bodies, the Globe and Mail seek to replenish the vital fluid at the expense of the printers. One can pity the man who is hard up through misfortune, but the Globe and Mail have no right to be hard up. There is a good profit in either business if managed on business principles. In endeavoring to kill the other, each has weakened itself. Now it has been found necessary to shift the burden upon innocent shoulders. The Globe and Mail should quit fooling, and in future endeavor to make an honest living by legitimate trade.

The Annexation Union.

The Canadian annexation union of which Alexander C. Walton is president and George S. Harrison, of Washington, is secretary, is preparing to hold a convention, August 5, at Niagara Falls. All the friends of the project of immediately (or sooner) annexing the Dominion to the United States are invited to be present, and a general invitation is extended to the President, members of Congress, Governors of states, members of state legislatures, mayors and aldermen of cities, and with all the rest, the governor general of the Canadian Dominion, who, as the representative of the British crown, is supposed to be specially favorable to the scheme. According to the call, holding the convention at Niagara Falls, which is especially stated to be "the great natural wonder of the world," is expressly intended "to aid in an amicable and fraternal union of the two countries."

Why Children Should Eat Honey.

Thousands and tens of thousands of children are dying all around us, why, because their ever developing nature demands sweetness, crave and eagerly demolish the adulterated "candies" end "syrups" of modern times. If these could be fed on honey insted they would devlope and grow up into healthy men and women.

Children would rather eat bread and honey than bread and butter; one pound of honey will reach as far as two pounds of butter, and has beside, the advantages of being far more healthy and pleasant tasted, and always remains good, while butter soon becomes rencid, and often produces cramps in stomach, eructations, sourness, vomiting and diarrhea. Pure honey should always be freely used in every family. Honey eaten upon wheat bread is very beneficial health.

The use of honey instead of sugar for almost every kind of cooking, is as pleasant for the palate as it is healthy for the stomach. In preparing blackberry, raspberry or strawberry shortcake it is infinitely superior.

It is a common expression that honey is a luxury, having nothing to do with the life given principal. This is an error—honey is food in one of its most concentrated forms. True, it does not add so much to the growth of muscales as does beefsteak, but it does impart other properties no less necessary to health and vigorous. physical and intellectual action. It gives vigor to all the vital functions. To the laborer it gives strength—to the business men mental force. Its effects are not like ordinary stimulants, such as spirits, etc., but it produces a healthy action, the results are pleasing and permanent—a sweet disposition and a bright intellect.—Truth.

Prizes for Types of Beauty.

The Committee of the Industrial Exhibition Association having charge of the ladies' department have decided to offer two valuable prizes for the portraits of the two most beautiful living Canadian ladies. Those who wish to enter into the competition are assured that the utmost secrecy will be preserved, no names will be attached to the portraits, but each picture will bear a number to correspond with the owner's name, which will be recorded in a register to be kept in the Secretary's office. No names will be made public beyond those of the winners of the prizes.

Horses become slothful and weak when fed on food containing an excess of starch, such as corn; in fact all bulky foods, which must be consumed in excessive quantities in order to get an necessary supply of nutriment, have the same tendency. When horses have a sense of fulness in their stomachs, they are not in a conditions for work; they should therefore receive but small quantities of coarse food during the day time. Now let the farmer apply this principal to himself. He lives on too starchy or bulky food—let him now ask himself how he lives to work when he feels like exploding from extreme expansion.

His Uncle's Heir.

CHAPTER IV.

It was long before Frank de Walden fell asleep that night, for his thoughts were all confused, and his nerves jarred with the shock they had received; but, much to his surprise, when he did doze off at last, his sleep was deep and dreamless, and when he awoke in the morning it was in a much calmer and more hopeful frame of mind.

The sun shone brightly into the pretty room, and the dewy sweetness of the summer dawn seemed to breathe fresh hope. His naturally elastic spirits rose, his disposition to make the best of everything served him in good stead now. He recalled the discussion of the previous night, Sir George's proposal to make him for the present a generous allowance, Sir George's practical suggestion that he himself should see Mr. Verner and lay before him the true state of affairs.

"What can it matter to him whether Essie is Lady de Walden or not? Nay, she shall be Lady de Walden too before she dies. They knight merely successful lawyers, and I will mount the woolsack for her sake, and put a coronet upon her pretty head if she cares to wear it. Oh, I will fear nothing, regret nothing! Mr. Verner must listen to reason, and Essie will be true."

Buoyed up with this conviction, and honestly sharing the poet's fancy that whatever is is best, Frank appeared at the break fast table with quite a radiant face, and laughed and chatted so pleasantly that a heavy weight was lifted from Sir George de Walden's mind, and Anita's large liquid eyes turned to him more than once with a serenely grateful look.

She was even more beautiful in the full morning light, in her pretty cotton gown, with its delicate crisp puffs and frillings, than she had been in the silken sheen of her full dress and in the softened lustre of the lamps. Frank looked with half dazzled eyes at the bright hair, the pure perfect face, the warm white skin, and serious shining eyes, and, as he looked, he murmured beneath his breath the line in which Tennyson has summarized all female beauty—

"'A sight to make an old man young!'"

"What is that, Frank?" Sir George asked looking sharply up from his paper; and Frank laughed guiltily, remembering how little complimentary to one side of the house his involuntary quotation had been.

"Where is the son and heir? Does he not pay a morning and evening visit?" he asked, half at random, to cover his confusion, and half because he really wished to renew his acquaintance with the pretty child.

Lady de Walden smiled, and Sir George said drily—

"Don't be impatient, Frank: you will have rather too much of that young man before your visit is over. Anita rarely lets him out of her sight."

"I am so strange here," Anita explained, resting her large eyes on the young man's face. "When we are at home, and Georgie has his governess and his lessons, it will not be so; but now I am afraid."

"Afraid of what?" her husband asked, with a little amused contempt, though Frank thought the young stranger's nervous terrors very natural and pretty. "Of the servants, or the De Walden tenantry? There are no brigands in the Westshire hills, and nothing worse than smugglers along the Westshire coast; so you may make your mind easy, though I do mean to run away and leave you."

"To leave me!" the girl cried, with widening eyes.

"Yes, but for the day only. I shall be back by the last train, and I shall leave Frank in charge."

Frank saw that the girl made a strong effort not to show the dismay she felt at this proposal; and, anxious to spare her pain, he put in eagerly—

"There is really no reason why you should take this journey, sir. I can explain all to Mr. Verner, or, for that matter, you could write."

"I have already written, asking Mr. Verner to receive me between one and two o'clock; so the only thing that is to be said on the subject is that I must start by the next train," Sir George answered decisively. "Frank, you must act as cicerone in my absence, for Anita is still a stranger in her home."

"Perhaps Lady de Walden would rather I went with you," Frank persisted, thinking the girl might shrink with shy distaste from the tak of entertaining or being entertained by a stranger; but Sir George, who had no wish that his nephew should assist at the coming interview with Mr. Verner, waved the proposal peremptorily aside, and Anita said, with evident sincerity—

"Oh, no; I would much rather have you stay!"

So he gave up the point as cheerfully as he could, saw his uncle off, and made up his mind for a long day's suspense.

"I shall be back before ten, Frank," Sir George cried as they parted at the little rustic station; "and I hope to bring news that will make amends for all. Who knows? Mr. Verner may let us have your Essie here upon a visit. Anita will be charmed to make an English friend."

Frank smiled and shook his head, feeling that it did not do to challenge Fate by hoping too much, and yet nearly as sanguine as the other in his heart.

He went back then to the Court, and conscientiously devoted himself to the task of amusing Lady de Walden and her son. It was a task that should not have been difficult, for the house was old, filled with curious legendary treasures, with historic tapestries, and ancestral portraits; and Frank, who was a thorough master of his subject, had very pretty natural gifts as a raconteur. But somehow he felt himself a failure today. Anita made a gallant effort to seem interested in all he told her; but her nerves had been overwrought, and she was suffering from a terrible depression now. She felt a stranger among strangers, as she wandered through the great gloomy galleries, listening abstractedly to an unfamiliar tongue. They were all friends and kin to her companion, these dead and gone De Waldens who lined the walls in ruff and farthingale, in armour and buff coat; but it seemed to her that, one and all alike, the large-eyed ladies, the solemn cavaliers, even her husband's mother, in a short-waisted, low-necked dress, with mittens on her plump arms and a straw hat tied down over her cherry cheeks and bright brown curls, seemed to frown darkly at her as an intruder and an alien in that sacred place.

"You are not well, Lady de Walden?" Frank cried at last, struck by her long silence; and then, turning to look at her, he saw that she had grown very pale, and that the violet eyes were painfully dilated—they looked almost black in her white face.

"Yes, I am well," the girl answered, with a little shiver. "But I am not welcome here. How should I be? I think I will go from among these people who look so coldly at me."

Frank stared, a little surprised; but the surprise soon turned to sympathy. The girl's eyes were rather wild and the soft contralto voice had a tragic ring; but her emotion was perfectly genuine. There was nothing in the least theatrical or affected about her, and he was quite imaginative enough to understand the effect such a scene might have upon a sensitive nature.

"I was very wrong to tire you, and keep you in that dull old place so long," he said, with honest compunction; "but my tongue runs away with me when I get among these old fellows and begin to tell their stories. I forget that I am boring people to death."

"You did not bore me," Anita said seriously; "and I am not tired. I am frightened, that is all."

"Frightened of your husband's, of Georgie's, ancestors?"

"Of them and of something else!" The girl paused with a strong shiver, and turned her golden head away—then, as though changing her purpose, looked round again and up at the kind troubled face above her with pitifully shining eyes. "Mr. de Walden, do you believe in presentiments?" she asked below her breath. "Because I have one today—I have had it all the way home. There is a shadow, a terror all around me; it comes nearer and nearer. I know it means harm to those I love—or to me."

Frank was not superstitious; but, as has been said before, he was highly imaginative. There was a terrible reality of conviction in her tone, and the fixed, frightened eyes which seemed to gaze on something hidden from his view impressed the young man disagreeably. He made a vigorous effort to shake off the uncomfortable feeling and answer in a practical common-sense tone; but the effort was not attended with any marked success. Anita soon conquered her nervous fears, and thanked him with her gentle graceful smile; but it was evident still that the haunting spectre was not exercised, though she resolutely thrust it out of sight.

"I was wrong in one thing, at least," she said, as she was leaving him. "Sir George told me that he had used you badly, and I thought you were to be our foe."

"I hope all your foes and troubles too may prove just such scarecrow phantoms," Frank said cordially." Take a little rest, Lady de Walden, and, believe me, all your fears will vanish in thin air."

She left him then, whether to follow his advice or not he did not of course know; and, though he had so decidedly pooh-poohed her terrors, he found himself considering them with grave attention as soon as her back was turned.

"There is some oppressive influence in the atmosphere," he thought, as he twisted and stroked his blonde moustache, and stared thoughtfully down the long avenue in which little Georgie, with his fair hair floating on the soft breeze, was playing with a gentle colley puppy, while his nurse sat and worked sedately under a shadow of a big beech-tree. "Who knows? She may be warned by some strange instinct of calamity at hand."

A child's laugh, fresh ringing, and silver sweet, elicited by some more than usually eccentric gambol upon the puppy's part, fell upon the young man's ear and cut his morbid musings short. His face brightened, and he drew himself up with a vigorous shake, as though ridding himself of some incumbrance.

"Pshaw—what an idiotic fancy!" he cried, as he stepped out into the sunshine. "If anyone should anticipate evil, it is I—I who may lose my love to-night; but I will not court sorrow; it will be hard enough to endure her crabbed presence when she comes."

The sunlight filtered through the green leaves and fell lovingly on the bright head and frank handsome face. The little lad ran to greet him, and clung to the strong brown hand of his new friend with childish trust, the puppy leaped up about his knees, claiming with large loose paws and an imbecilely open mouth some share of his notice too. The love and trust of the innocent young creatures pleased and touched Frank de Walden; he pulled the dog's ears and patted his little cousin's golden curls, as he turned to the nurse, and said in his pleasant cordial way—

"I will take Master Georgie for a walk, nurse; he must learn to trust me, you know."

The nurse made her prim little courtesy, thinking what a good-hearted and nice spoken young gentleman this was, though not long afterwards she recalled those innocent-sounding words with a horrified thrill; but she at least was troubled with no presentiments, and went back to the house to enjoy her unexpected holiday hour with whole-hearted content.

Meanwhile, with Georgie clinging to his hand and trotting on those sturdy little legs beside him, with the puppy jumping and frisking about his heels, Frank went off to visit the water-fowl in the big lake, to feed the peacocks on the terrace, and the chickens and the ducklins in the farm yard. Never had little Georgie in his brief innocent life known so happy a day or a friend so much to his mind. His delight with all he saw was irresistible and infectious. He chatted like a little magpie, and his shrill sweet little laugh rang out perpetually as some fresh miracle of fluffy beauty met his enraptured eyes.

"Come, Georgie must go back now," Frank said, consulting his watch at last, though the child showed no symtom of fatigue; he knew that for a mite like that enough of exercise and excitement had been crowded into one day; and, with a longing look back, the obedient little fellow came at once to Frank's side.

But, as he returned him to the nurse's care, Frank felt the fat little arms clasp themselves about his throat, saw the pretty face, with its flushed cheeks and sparkling blue eyes, uplift itself to his, and heard the soft voice whisper coaxingly—

"To-morrow, cousin Frank—again to-morrow?"

"To-morrow!" Frank repeated the word a little dreamily, wondering what for him that morrow would bring forth. "Yes, surely, Georgie, to-morrow sha'll be as pleasant for you and me as to-day."

Little Georgie was fully content with this promise, and went in the highest spirits to his meal of bread-and-milk; but the rest of the day hung rather wearily on Frank's hands, and it was with something like rapture that he hailed the approach of his uncle's train. He had driven over to the station to meet him; and when he saw the familiar figure step out upon the platform, he felt his heart stand still. In another moment he should know his fate—nay, he knew it already, for as the flickering light of the oil-lamp fell upon Sir George de Walden's face, he saw that it was full of angry disappointment and pain.

The conviction was an assured one from the first, and Sir George's stern silence strengthened it. It was not until they were bowling smoothly along the moonlit road, between the tall gorse clad hills, that Frank found strength or self-control to speak. Then he said, in an uncertain voice—

"You have seen Mr. Verner?"

"Yes; I have failed in my embassy. Mr. Verner says that he promised his daughter to my heir, that he utterly refuses to give her to a poor and struggling man."

He spoke with hard distinctness, and Frank listened in a stony calm. It seemed to him now that he had known from the very first how it would be, what message his uncle would bring.

"And Essie?" he began, but Sir George cut the question short.

"I did not see Miss Verner; but her father seemed assured of her obedience. Frank my dear, dear boy, I have never felt how much I wronged you until to-day."

"You had a right to consider yourself," Frank said, in the same dull tone; and Sir George finished the sentence with genuine self-reproach.

"To consider myself! Yes; but not to make a dupe of you. I am regretting the long concealment, not the marriage, Frank."

But Frank did not answer; he was absorbed in miserable thoughts.

CHAPTER V.

"Stand still, Master Georgie!" the nurse said, with a despairing sigh, as she vainly tried to settle the smart scarlet cap upon the silky curls that shone like pale gold in the morning sunshine, and keep the little dancing figure still. "You shall have your little stool, and sit on the terrace with Carlo presently; but you must not expect your cousin yet for a long, long time. He has not had breakfast yet."

"I have had brexfus," said the child, with an argumentative air; but the nurse shook her head.

"Grown-up gentlefolks are not like little boys," she said peremptorily.

She was fond of her charge no doubt; but Georgie, in his impatience to renew the delights of yesterday, was exacting and irritable, and her patience had been sorely tried. So she gave gave the child a little shake and deposited him on his hassock in the verandah, with strict injunctions not to stir until his cousin came, and then went in to add a freshening touch or two to her own lette for the day.

"That child will wear me into my grave!" she cried pettishly to a house maid she met in the hall. "I never saw any one worry for anything as he has done for his cousin since yesterday."

"Well, he will be happy now," the girl answered with a laugh, "for Mr. de Walden has just gone out, to get the walk over before breakfast, I suppose."

The nurse supposed so too, and, busy with her own affairs, thought no more about the matter. Her window overlooked the verandah in which the child sat, and, as she bustled about, she heard the little voice ring out with the welcoming cry of—"Cousin Fwank, cousin Fwank!" and the hurrying patter of the little feet as they ran round the side of the house.

"Thank goodness for an hour's peace!" she cried devoutly. "I do think Mr. Frank de Walden is the kindest gentleman and the greatest blessing that ever came into a house."

* * * * * *

"It is strange that Frank does not make his appearance," said Sir George de Walden, coming back from the window out of which he had been gazing with absent eyes, and taking his place at the well-spread breakfast-table. "I trust he is not taking this matter too much to heart—not resenting it to us."

He spoke almost querulously, and Anita shook her fair head.

"I do not think so. He is so generous, so kind; and he is not ill, for nurse tells me he has taken Georgie for a walk."

"Taken Georgie!" her husband echoed, opening his eyes widely, as though the information astonished him. "Well, that is good natured I must say!"

"Yes, they had a long walk together yesterday, and nurse says Georgie could talk of nothing but the chickens and swans and his cousin all last night He exacted the promise of another stroll to-day, and roused her at daybreak to prepare for it."

"Little tyrant!" Sir George said with a proud laugh. "Frank might have kept his promise, and eaten his breakfast too, though." Then, turning to the servant, he added—"See that the cook keeps something hot for Mr. De Walden, Fletcher."

The man left the room, and, the moment he had gone, Sir George put down his paper and chuckled complacently.

"He cannot be so very broken-hearted if he can remember a baby's wish. Perhaps it is a mere flash-in-the-pan fancy, and he is not really in love with Miss Verner at all. I hope so with all my heart, for the father is a hard unyielding man, made harder still by the thought that he has been tricked into a promise."

"But surely he does not accuse Frank of any treachery?" Anita cried, with an emphasis that brought the colour to her husband's face.

"Well, he has been deceived of course," he said reluctantly, smoothing the broad sheet of the Times out with rather a trembling hand. "And though Heaven knows poor Frank was innocent in the matter, the man naturally thought him a much more eligible suitor than he is."

"Can you do nothing for him, George!"

"I can and I will," Sir George said emphatically. "I told Mr. Verner very plainly that I felt that I had been to blame, and had incurred a moral responsibility in the matter of my nephew's career; but he absolutely declined to discuss the matter, and hinted pretty plainly that he considered the lad an impostor."

"And the girl?" Anita asked anxiously.

Sir George shrugged his shoulders.

"I should say Mr. Verner's domestic discipline was pretty strict. The is an air of assured authority about him. But do not be distressed, my pet; Frank is made of sterling stuff, and a love-affair will not crush him."

He took up the paper again as the man re-entered the room, this time bearing a note on a small tray.

"It was found in Mr. De Walden's room, sir," he said, with what almost looked like a faint flush of interest in his ordinarily impassive face. Anita pushed back her chair and came quickly over to her husband's side.

"From Frank! What can it be?" she cried, with nervous impatience at the slow fashion in which he turned the missive over. "Oh, open it, George, and see!"

Sir George obeyed, and read the few lines the letter contained in a very querulous tone.

"My dear Uncle,—Neither you nor Lady de Walden must think me ungracious or unkind, but the news you gave me last night was a terrible shock, and has upset me more than I quite like to show. I cannot rest till I have heard her father's verdict confirmed by Esther's own lips, and so I have gone to her. Do not trouble about me; all will end well one way or another. If she will wait for me, I will be the happiest of men; if not—well, 'Men have died from time to time, and worms have eaten them, but not for love'—and my wound will cure like the rest. So I am off by the early train."

A shrill scream broke from Lady de Walden's lips, and, but for the desperate strength with which she clutched the tall chair-back, she must have fallen. Sir George looked up his face was merely cross and puzzled: but one glance at that drawn, blanched face, those eyes of utter agony, and he sprang quickly to his feet, flung one arm around his wife's waist, and tried to draw her to a chair; but, ghastly as she looked, she broke from him with desperate strength and hurried towards the door, all the anguish and terror of her heart finding vent in the hoarse cry—

"My boy—Georgie! Oh, let me go!"

But Sir George drew her forcibly back. He too had grown perceptibly paler, and had a very startled look; but he had still calmness enough to feel that her hysterical excitement was misplaced.

"Calm yourself for Heaven's sake, Anita, and I will ring for nurse," he said, more sternly than he had ever spoken to his wife yet. "Georgie is no doubt with her by now; your alarm is childish and absurd."

But, though he spoke so calmly, he was by no means easy in his mind; and, when the nurse at last appeared, with a pale face and tear-reddened frightened eyes, his fears were almost equal to those that tore poor Anita's heart in two.

"Master Georgie is not yet back?" he repeated sternly. "How came you to loose sight of him for so long?"

"Please, sir, it was Mr. De Walden!" the girl cried, with a curtsey and a stifling sob, for the news that Mr. De Walden had taken train to town had spread quickly through the house, and left the little lad's fate involved in mystery to the servants' mind. "He cried to go with his cousin; and how could I refuse the precious darling that?"

"And you left him in Mr. De Walden's care?"

The girl hesitated for the fraction of a second only, divided between the desire to tell the absolute truth and the necessity of shielding herself from blame; then there came comfortingly to her ears the echo of that gleeful baby cry, "Cousin Fwank, cousin Fwank!" and she answered promptly—

"Yes, sir; Mr. de Walden made the engagement over night, and came to fetch the darling in the morning."

Sir George drew a long, long breath, and brushed the gray hair back from his forehead.

"Then he is safe," he said decisively; "he must be safe in his cousin's care. Anita my darling"—taking the death-cold hands in his, and looking entreatingly at the drawn tragic face—"Frank has not gone; he has lost his train. He will bring back our darling!

But Anita neither heard nor comprehended him. Staring straight before her, with the dull, fixed gaze of a somnambulist, she said, with dry stiff lips—

"Harm to me or those I love! I knew—I knew it. I told him that yesterday. Oh, my boy, my little Georgie! Oh that it had been me!"

"This is terrible!" Sir George cried below his breath; and the handsome stately gentleman seemed to grow old, decrepit, and helpless in the sudden stress of strong emotions. "Anita, for Georgie's sake, be calm and strong If—if—there is any danger, remember there is work to do."

Lady de Walden raised her lovely eyes with a more comprehending look, as her lips closed, and her small hands were clasped convultely, as Sir George went on hurriedly—

"I will drive over to the station. Do you have the grounds thoroughly searched. How we shall laugh at all this fuss and terror when Frank brings our darling back!"

"When!" Anita echoed with dreary bitterness; but she had in a measure regained her self-control, and promised to obey all directions so steadily that her husband left her with one fear the less in his heart.

The Simultaneous Firing of Shots.

According to George G. Andre, the system of exploding a number of shots simultaneously in rock blasting is making it way slowly into common use. It is surprising that a system offering so many advantages should need so much advocacy. Some portion of the prejudice against it is no doubt due to the past failures. But the obvious certainty obtained by using powerful currents, and the ease with which such currents may be applied when the works are lighted by electricity, should be sufficient to induce the disappointed to try again. A good example of the application of the lighting current to the ignition of blasts, and, I believe, the first of its kind, has just come under my notice in Germany. The mine is a colliery, and the surface works are lighted by air lamps. Underground, a stone drift is driven, and this drift is lighted by incandescent lamps. In the face, from twenty to twenty-four shots are placed, and an electric fuse in each is joined up in parallel circuit by means of bare iron wire and connected with lighting cables in such a way that the current can be shunted from the lamps into the fuses. The result is in the highest degree satisfactory. Misfires are unknown, and the effect is wonderfully good. It is estimated that from twenty-eight to thirty-two shots would be needed if fired in the usual manner in succession; so that the saving of labor is in this case considerable, exceeding 25 per cent., both for the labor of boring and the quantity of explosive required.

Ashes and Other Sources of Potash.

Wood ashes vary greatly in the amount of potash they contain, according to the variety of wood of which they are made. The most valuable are those made of oak, and the least valuable those made of the conifera, or resinous trees. According to Prof. S. W. Johnson's recent analyses, ashes from a few varieties of timber contained potash as follows: oak, 8 25; hickory, 6 10; chestnut, ...; conifera, 1 25 per cent. The average amount of potash in ashes from house stoves, under the most favorable conditions, was ... per cent., and unleached Canada ashes (... samples) average 5.75 per cent.

Rating ashes at 50 pounds per bushel, we have in household ashes, per bushel, 4 25 pounds of potash, and in Canada ashes 2 88 pounds. At $4\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound, the value of the ashes per bushel for potash alone would be: household ashes, 18 cents, and Canada ashes, $12\frac{1}{2}$ cents. They also contain ... per cent. of phosphoric acid, or one ... in each bushel, worth six cents, which, added to the value of the potash, would make the total value of domestic ashes 24 cents, and of Canada ashes, $18\frac{1}{2}$ cents per bushel.

Leached ashes weigh about 60 pounds per bushel, and contain about 30 per cent. of water. They hold about 42 per cent. of carbonate of lime, about one per cent. of potash, about one per cent. of phosphoric acid ... a bushel would be worth 2 97 cents for ... potash; add to this the value of the phosphoric acid, and we have about nine cents. The current market price I believe ... from 13 to 20 cents, so that there would ... to be a loss on every bushel used; yet ... a fact that in many sections the use of leached ashes is attended with results that show that they are worth, at least, their cost, and that the apparent loss must be compensated for by the other ingredients. The carbonate of lime which they contain ... on many soils, undoubtedly contributed to these good results. Some samples of Canada unleached ashes have been found but little better than leached ashes.

Muriate of potash of 80 per cent. strength, contains 50 per cent. of its total weight of potash, which, at $2.12\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound for muriate, would cost 4.25 cents per pound for the actual potash.

Sulphate of potash of 80 per cent. strength contains 40 per cent. of actual potash; and in this form, with sulphate at 2 8 cents per pound, the potash would cost seven cents per pound. Potash in the form of sulphate is found to be superior as a manure, and to produce larger crops and healthier growth, especially of tobacco, fruits, potatoes and ... To obtain potash as cheaply from wood ashes, we should have to obtain Canada unleached ashes at 13 cents; and leached at three cents per bushel. But certain considerations must not be overlooked in comparing ashes with other sources of potash. In the first place, the potash in ashes is in such a combination that it can do no harm to any crop to which we apply it. In the case of muriate, it is different; this we must use with great caution, especially on tobacco, ... or any other crop where starch and sugar formation is desirable. For corn, grass and grain this form is unobjectionable. ... ashes contain considerable soda, magnesia and other ingredients, which must have more or less beneficial effects on some soils, as is shown by the results sometimes obtained.

Bones on the Farm.

A solution of potash will reduce bone to a fine condition, and make it available for plant food. Most farmers still use wood for fuel, and the ashes from the fifteen or twenty cords used in a year, if saved, would reduce all the bones ordinarily within reach of the farmer. The old-fashioned leach that used to stand at almost every farmer's back door for soap making, was a good contrivance for reducing the bones. But any tight, strong cask or box, will answer quite as well for this purpose. Water poured upon the ashes makes a lye, or solution of potash, strong enough to decompose the bones. The casks should stand under the cover, so that the quantity of water applied to the bone and ashes, may be under control. The time it will take to reduce the bone to a powder, will depend upon the amount of potash in the ashes, and attention bestowed upon the process. It is essential that the ashes and bone should be closely packed in the mass, and that they be kept in a moist state, allowing water as it evaporates from the surface. The finer the bone before it is packed in the ashes, the sooner it will be reduced. The process can be hastened by putting into the mass a few pounds of common potash. But this is only necessary to save time. Ashes from hickory, or any of the hard woods, contain sufficient potash to decompose the bones. When the mass is soft enough to break down with a spade or shovel, it can be mixed with land plaster, dried peat, or loam, to make it convenient for handling.

It is a concentrated fertilizer, to be used with discretion, in the hill, or applied as a top dressing to growing crops in the garden or field. We are quite sure that any one who tries this preparation of bone and wood ashes, will see the vigorous push it gives to garden and other crops, will be likely to continue it. Not many farmers near seaports and railroad stations, use coal mainly for fuel, and have to resort to hand or horse-mill to use up the waste bones. Small mills are extensively used by poultry men, for crushing oyster shells as well as bone, and the machinery can be adjusted to break the bones coarsely for hen feed. The oil and gelatine of the bones are an alimentary value, and, turned into soap, pay much better than when used as a fertilizer for the soil.—Wm. Clift, in American Agriculturist.

Ashes and Other Sources of Potash.

Wood ashes vary greatly in the amount of potash they contain, according to the variety of wood of which they are made. The most valuable are those made of oak, and the least valuable those made of the conifera, or resinous trees. According to Prof. S. W. Johnson's recent analyses, ashes from a few varieties of timber contained potash as follows: oak, 8 25; hickory, 6 10; chestnut, 3 50; conifera, 1 25 per cent. The average amount of potash in ashes from house stoves, under the most favorable conditions, was 5 per cent., and unleached Canada ashes (3 samples) average 5 75 per cent.

Leaching ashes at 50 pounds per bushel, we have in household ashes, per bushel, 4 25 pounds of potash, and in Canada ashes 2 88 pounds. At 4½ cents per pound, the value of the ashes per bushel for potash alone would be: household ashes, 18 cents, and Canada ashes, 12½ cents. They also contain 3 per cent. of phosphoric acid, or one pound in each bushel, worth six cents, which, added to the value of the potash, would make the total value of domestic ashes 24 cents, and of Canada ashes, 18½ cents per bushel.

Leached ashes weigh about 60 pounds per bushel, and contain about 30 per cent. of water. They hold about 42 per cent. of carbonate of lime, about one per cent. of potash, about one per cent. of phosphoric acid and a bushel would be worth 2 97 cents for the potash; add to this the value of the phosphoric acid, and we have about nine cents. The current market price I believe varies from 13 to 20 cents, so that there would seem to be a loss on every bushel used; yet the fact that in many sections the use of leached ashes is attended with results to show that they are worth, at least, their cost, and that the apparent loss must be compensated for by the other ingredients. The carbonate of lime which they contain acts on many soils, undoubtedly contributed to these good results. Some samples of Canada unleached ashes have been found but little better than leached ashes.

Muriate of potash of 80 per cent. strength contains 50 per cent. of its total weight of potash, which, at 2.12½ cents per pound for muriate, would cost 4.25 cents per pound for the actual potash.

Sulphate of potash of 80 per cent. strength contains 40 per cent. of actual potash; and this form, with sulphate at 2 8 cents per pound, the potash would cost seven cents per pound. Potash in the form of sulphate is found to be superior as a manure, and to produce larger crops and healthier growth, especially of tobacco, fruits, potatoes and corn. To obtain potash as cheaply from wood ashes, we should have to obtain Canada unleached ashes at 13 cents; and leached at three cents per bushel. But certain conditions must not be overlooked in comparing prices with other sources of potash. In the first place, the potash in ashes is in such a combination that it can do no harm to any crop to which we apply it. In the case of potash, it is different; this we must use with great caution, especially on tobacco, potatoes or any other crop where starch and sugar formation is desirable. For corn, wheat and grain this form is unobjectionable. Again, ashes contain considerable soda, magnesia and other ingredients, which must have a more or less beneficial effects on some soils, as is shown by the results sometimes obtained.

A Variation of the Usual Frog Story.

A waggon of the Talmage Lake Ice Company delivered a large cake of ice to Mr. Lapping. A servant split the piece open, and just in the centre was a large frog. The animal was a long black one of the species known as the Michigan frog, and weighed two pounds or over. The man who delivered the ice said that it was a part of a cake that had been stored away by the Talmage Company in their ice house for over three years, so that the frog had been a prisoner in his cold dungeon for all that time. When his township was quite lively when relieved from his prison, and hopped around as vigorously as any of his tribe. Ed Early of the hook and ladder company on Eighth street has charge of him, and will give him to the foreman of engine house No. 7, who will put him in their fountain.

CIVIL WAR ON AN ISLAND.

The Calamity that Threatens the Simplicity of the Inhabitants of Sulu.

In Maimbun, the residence of the Sultans of Sulu, there lives not a single European. A small number of Chinese once settled there, but were driven away sooner or later by the natives. The whole town, which is very romantically situated, consists of huts, built on piles. Even the Sultan's palace does not deserve a grander name.

In the interior of the island, which is in its primitive state, there is not a civilised being, with the exception of a planter and his family. This planter is a German named Schuck, who has created a real paradise in the midst of the wilderness. He was once a Captain of a ship, and furnished the natives with German needle guns and ammunition during the invasion of the Spaniards. He took first a schooner and then a steamer, which, with their cargoes, were confiscated by the Spaniards. Schuck, strange to say, was not taken, and the then Sultan, Mohammed Imallo Alam, presented him with a considerable piece of land, which he carefully cultivated. Since that time Schuck has been on the most friendly terms with the royal family, educates the children, and is idolized by the natives. After residing for some years in Sulu he sent to Germany for his family, which at present consists of three daughters and a son, all under the age of twenty. This family paid us a visit on board the Leipsic, where they were most kindly received by the Captain and officers.

At present there is a difficulty about the Sultan of Sulu. Mahommed, mentioned above, died a few years ago, and shortly after his son and successor also died, so that only the old Sultana, with two sons in their minority, is left behind. But there is a grown up son of the Sultan by one of his slaves, whom part of the subjects wish to have as Sultan until the real heir comes of age, which is at sixteen, while the greater part of the people, and most of the chiefs, have already acknowledged the legitimate successor in spite of his minority. The dispute is to be settled by a civil war, which would be very welcome to the Spaniards. The Sultana is extremely anxious about the result, and therefore determined to address a letter to the German Emperor, and give it to Capt. Herbig to forward. On Sunday, the 6th of April, we had a visit from Prince Mahommed, who, in spite of his youth, made a good impression, and seemed very intelligent. As owing to the prevailing condition of affairs the captain could not receive him as the Sultan, his mother had begged that he might be treated with all the regard possible. The Prince wore a gold embroidered uniform set with a quantity of small gems and pearls, while his hands sparkled with brilliants. Capt. Schuck had come on board to act as interpreter, and received the Prince as if he were his son. The infantry were exercised and salvos fired and the great precision in firing seemed especially to interest the prince. He was immensely impressed by the machinery, which happened to be in motion. Among his companions, who spread all over the ship, were two Turks, but I could not discover what part they played.

The Prince had brought his mother's letter, which he delivered to the captain. Its contents, translated from the native language, ran thus: "This letter comes from the widow, thy daughter, to her father his Majesty the German Emperor, Wilhelm I., dictated by a pure and affectionate heart. I acquaint your Majesty with the fact that the German ship Leipsic has visited us. The captain visited us and showed us great honor for which we are thankful. Thy daughter has had a great misfortune. First I lost the Sultan, my husband, and then the Sultan, his successor my son, and I am left alone with the minor children. The greater number of our subjects have acclaimed my son as successor, but there are many who have not acknowledged him, and this causes me great anxiety; but I hope the Almighty God will help us over this difficulty. We are much rejoiced that thou great Prince dost remember us, and we promise that any of thy subjects who wish to come to us or settle among us shall always find protection. Written on the 10th day of the month Dschemadal, at one and a half of the afternoon, in Maimbun, in the year 1301 (1884) of the Hegira. (Sealed).—From the Vossiche Zeitung.

Siberian Hospitality.

Even hospitality, that true Slavonic virtue, has not become acclimatized in this inhospitable region. The peasants like to visit and treat each other, especially on high days and holidays; but this hospitality is the result of calculation. When a man is going to visit his neighbor, he never goes straight to the house, but walks along the road, and stops as if by chance at the window and begins a conversation; then, if the master or mistress wishes to see him, they invite him in. When the samovar is ready, they drink tea out of saucers, now and then taking a bite of a piece of sugar. In this way they consume about three cups, and then turn the cup upside down, placing on the bottom the remains of the sugar they have been nibbling at.

As soon as tea is over, the guest rises to go, and then the following dialogue invariably takes place: "Why are you in such a hurry?" says the hostess.

"Time to go home," answers the guest.

"Stay a little longer."

"Thank you; you have given us plenty to eat and drink."

"There was but little."

"No; there was quite enough; we had plenty."

This conversation, which always takes place, and is almost mechanically repeated, being ended, the guest approaches the host, and taking his hands, says, "I thank you for the vodka, the tea, the cakes, the sugar," etc.

It is indispensable, when thanking the host, to enumerate everything the guest has consumed during his visit. At the end of this catalogue the visitor humbly begs his host to come and see him, which, after a time, he does, and things go on in exactly the same way. Care must be taken that the viands provided are of equal quantity and quality. If, at any time a man eats or drinks more than the host, when his guest, on a former occasion, did, quarrels, upbraidings, or sarcastic remarks are the result.

"I gave them tea and sugar, and they gave me nothing but tea;" or, "I gave them cake, and had nothing but bread in return."

When you play leap frog with adversity, the latter does the leaping.

Prince Bismarck's Morning Beer Party.

Prince Bismarck gave his Parliamentary "Fruhschoppen," or morning party, recently at the Palace in the Wilhelmstrasse, Berlin. This year the affair was to some extent marred by unfavorable weather, and Prince Bismarck, instead of entertaining his guests in the grounds attached to his palace, received them at the door of the celebrated Congress Chamber. The absence of the cheering sun was to some extent made up for by the strains of a military band, while the Prince's visitors regaled themselves from richly-supplied buffets, and with bumpers of the choicest beer, claret, Rhenish, and champagne. The "private conference," of course, turned out to be of a very light and chatty kind, its chief feature being the monologues of the lord of the mansion. The geese included, in addition to a larger number of ladies than usual, most of the Ministers, members of the Federal Council, and members of nearly all sections of the Opposition, as well as of the Ministerial parties. Among the Liberals present was Herr Rickert, whom Prince Bismarck greeted in a very friendly manner, in spite of their strong political antagonism.

One of the Prince's guests questioned him as to the brewing of the excellent beer he was drinking, and was told that it was Franciscan brew from Munich, and a gift to him from Count Holstein. A story which was told of certain important diplomatic services rendered by the latter nobleman at a critical moment during the Franco German war reminded Prince Bismarck of an interview he had with M. Thiers on the subject of the capitulation of Paris, and the money contribution to be imposed on the city.

The episode, which has never been related before, was thus described by Prince Bismarck:

"Of course I demanded as much as I knew beforehand would be refused me. I said to M. Thiers, 'A city so large and wealthy as Paris would feel insulted if I asked anything under a milliard.' On this M. Thiers made a very wry face and prepared to take his leave. I accompanied him out of politeness, and the negotiation was continued on our way down stairs, and on the last step but one we agreed to the sum of 200 millions. Hereupon I went to the Emperor, and put to him whether it would not be as well to assign these 200 millions to the South German States, which had to pay us war indemnities in 1866. The Emperor said: 'Prepare me, then, a resolution to this effect,' to which I replied that this I could not do, adding that as soon as I took up my pen as Chancellor the matter was done, 'for your Majesty must do it yourself as Commander-in Caief of the German army. I remained alone in my opinion, and the matter went no further."

The Bank of England.

The second function of the Bank is the management of the national debt, by which it relieves the government of all the clerical details attending the purchase and transfer of stock and the payment of dividends. No one would be willing to lend money to a government without an engagement for a repayment at a fixed time, nor without some arrangement enabling the lender to transfer his interest in the debt to any one willing to purchase it, and it is a condition of every loan made to the British government that it shall be transferable, and that the dividends shall always be paid half yearly at the bank of England. The certainty of the fulfilment of this condition has been one of the elements which have made the government stocks a favorite form of investment. The national funded debt of the United Kingdom is now upward of £700,000 000, divisible into any number of accounts, and any person whose name has once been entered as a holder of stock in the bank books may sell all or any part of his stock at almost any time, and without cost transfer it to as many different persons as he chooses to deal with through his broker. The broker is necessary to the transaction that the bank may be sure that the transferer is the person he represents himself to be, and the only essential qualification of this agent is membership of the Stock Exchange, and a personal introduction to the Bank officials. There are several hundred thousand of these accounts, which, if more persons desire to invest their money in government securities, might be multiplied tenfold, the only limit placed upon them being that none of them shall be for less than one penny. No matter how many separate accounts are opened, the Bank is bound to keep them; and on every account a separate order or "warrant" is made out every half-year for a payment of the dividend from which a deduction has to be made for the property tax and paid to the government. The dividends are paid to any one applying for them when they are due, and more than half of them are usually collected by the stockholders' private bankers, who transmit the amount to their customers, or advise them of it by the evening mail of dividend day; thus all holders in Great Britain may either receive their dividends or hear that they have been collected for them on the same day, and it is unusual for an error of even one penny to be made in this vast operation. If desired the dividend warrants are sent by the Bank to the stock holders by post. For this service the Bank receives from the government about £200,000 a year, or £300 for every million of the national debt below six hundred millions, and £150 for every million above six hundred millions.

A White Rainbow.

In the midst of a shower of mingled hail and rain, about 9½ o'clock yesterday morning, there was visible for a minute or two a segment of rainbow that lacked the usual prismatic colors. It was a belt of pure white circling across the misty curtain of falling pellets of snow and raindrops. In France some months ago the papers had much to say about a white rainbow seen in that country. It was spoken of as a thing unprecedented. Twice within the past twelve months the phenomenon has been visible from this city. In neither case, however, was the bow a complete semicircle. The white rainbow is by no means an uncommon thing in mountainous regions, or, rather, in such regions the opportunities for seeing the phenomenon are much better than in valley regions, the observers occupying elevations from which they may see storms and mists in deep valleys and gorges far below them, and also may see the effect of even a meridian sun upon such passing showers and rolling vapors, whereas in a level region the effect would be below the horizon and invisible to the inhabitants.—Virginia Enterprise.

HINTS FOR HOT WEATHER.

Don't shake the hornet's nest to see if any of the family are at home.

Don't go near a draught. If a draught comes towards you, run away. A slight draught is not dangerous.

Don't blow in the gun your grandfather carried in the war of 1812. It is more dangerous now than it was then.

Don't hold a wasp by the other end while you thaw it out in front of the stove to see if it is alive. It is generally alive.

Don't try to persuade a bulldog to give up a yard of which it is in possession. Possession to a bulldog is ten points of law.

A Parisian Bird Charmer's Singular Powers.

Paris has found a new sensation in a bird charmer, who has been astonishing the boulevardiers with his powers. A bet was made between him and a M Loizay, a gentleman who was rather skeptical in such matters. The conditions were that M. Loizey should furnish a dozen birds, which were to be at the disposal of the charmer for fifteen minutes. At the end of that time M Picard was to open the cage which contained them and each bird was to alight upon a certain arbutus, brought upon the ground by him and placed at a distance of 100 metres from the point where they were liberated. For each bird that did not obey the charm within a quarter of an hour M. Picard was to pay M. Loizey fifty francs, and for each bird which did M. Loizy was to pay M. Picard the same sum.

When the time of the test arrived so large and so curious a crowd had gathered on the Champ de Mars that it was impossible to maintain the needful space of 100 metres around the spot where the cage was placed. Forty metres was all the distance that could be secured. The results, therefore, were not accepted as determining the bet, and another trial will be made. The birds, however—released under these conditions—flew, one by one, to the arbutus and perched on its branches, to the great astonishment of the spectators. M. Picard's charm consists, it is believed, in impregnating these branches with a colorless and mysterious liquid, the secret of which is as yet his own.

The left side of the face is the right; statistics prove the paradox. Artists always put the best touches, finest shading, and most delicate tints on the left side of the profile. Actors, actresses, and public singers always make a half turn to the right, when they wish to impress their audiences. Young ladies desirous of bewitching their gentlemen friends always walk on the right-hand side. Why? Because science has shown that the left side of the face is more beautiful or less ugly. The left hand is more magnetic than the right the left breast has a more graceful contour than the opposite, and the glance of the left eye has a bewitching power of which the right is hopelessly innocent. The theme will bear infinite expansion, but we forbear to pursue it The remarkable part of the now well-known fact is that the discovery was made by the Chinese. In the year 9381 Ah Fing Fy Foy had a family of seventeen daughters. They were all left-handed, and were greatly sought in marriage by members of the royal household. So irresistible were the charms of these moon-eyed maidens that every man who looked upon them became enslaved. To save the empire from internecine war for their possession, the Emperor made an edict that the daughters of Ah Hing Fy Foy should be allowed to have thirteen husbands each, but that in the future all left-handed girls should be strangled at their birth.

A Sad Case.

A case which lately came before a French court illustrates how cruelly small are the official salaries in France, which, it must be remembered, is no longer a cheap country, now that it has the largest debt in the world. Mlle. R. is the orphan daughter of a Surgeon-Major. A very bright girl, she passed brilliant examinations for the position of a schoolmistress just at the time that she lost her father, when her necessities being urgent (her mother was then alone and totally unprovided for), some friends got her appointed Postmistress at a small town, with a salary of $160 a year, which salary did not begin until two months after she had entered on her duties. Meantime the person who had boarded her mother clamored for payment of $120 due, and went so far as to sell off all her poor little property, and Mlle. R, in ill health, had herself been obliged to contract some small debts. Reduced to the last extremity, she took official money to the extent of $240, and, knowing that the loss of her position was certain if the deficit should be discovered, opened a letter and took two of the four $200 bills it contained, with which she made up the deficiency in her cash account. But this was soon found out, and she was committed for trial. The court sentenced her to two years imprisonment. Extenuating circumstances have often been discovered by French courts in less deserving cases.

Reading Aloud.

A very pleasant habit for home life is that of reading aloud some pleasant book in the evenings, and if the selection of the book is wise it certainly makes the home circle very attractive, and lightens the drudgery of the mother, who often sits after tea with her basket of stockings to be darned, and who has a dreary time if each member of the family, who does not go out, takes his or her paper or book, as I have often seen, and subsides into their own interesting reading, leaving her to her own meditations. A book read aloud at home gets a charm apart from itself sometimes; its very name will conjure up in our memories scenes in the far past—the pleasant family circle then, perhaps, unbroken, the cheerful fireside, and frequently, too, the comments upon what is being read which add to the interest and give a newer insight. The same association applies to a piece of work which is in operation while any book is being read.

"There's no calamity could befall a woman which I have not suffered," said an Indianapolis woman to her husband. "Oh, no, my dear; not so bad as that. For instance, you are not a widow," he answered sweetly. She held her breath two seconds, and then retorted: "I said calamity, sir."

The Irreverent Deer.

An English clergyman, the Rev. R. S. Hawker, had, among his other pets, a pair of stags, which he named Robin Hood and Maid Marian. One day, a brother clergyman a Mr. Knight, while walking in the grounds where the deer were kept, approached too near Robin Hood. The stag ran at him and butted him to the ground. The man's shrieks brought Mr. Hawker to the rescue. Being a strong man, he caught the deer by the horns, drew his head back, and held him fast while the frightened man crawled away.

"The stag would have turned on me when I let go," said Mr. Hawker, in telling the story. "and I did not quite see my way to escape. But that wretched man did nothing but yell for his wig and hat, which were under the deer's feet. He seemed to think my life was of no account beside his old wig and battered beaver."

Dr. Philpots the famous bishop of Exeter, visited Mr. Hawker not long after this incident occurred, and he, too, must needs inspect Robin Hood. Suddenly the clergyman was startled by the bishop's cries of distress. Looking out he saw the prelate struggling with the stag. Robin had taken a fancy to the silk apron, which English bishops wear as a badge of office. Gently approaching, he had secured a corner of it in his mouth, and, when Hawker heard the cry, was drawing the silk badge further and farther down his throat. The Bishop was struggling and trying in vain to unfasten the apron as his host came up. Hawker caught the deer by the throat and forced him to disgorge. The bishop left Robin in disgust.

Why Men Fail.

Few men come up to their highest measure of success. Some fail through timidity, or lack of nerve. They are unwilling to take the risks incident to life, and fail through fear of venturing on ordinary duties. They lack pluck. Others fail through imprudence, lack of discretion, care or sound judgment. They overestimate the future, build air castles, and venture beyond their depth, and fail and fall.

Others, again, fail through lack of application and perseverance. They begin with good resolves, but soon get tired of that and want a change, thinking they can do much better at something else. Thus they fritter life away, and succeed at nothing. Others waste time and money, and fail for want of economy. Many fail through ruinous habits—tobacco, whisky, and beer spoil them for business, drive their best customers from them, and scatter their prospects of success. Some fail for want of brains, education, and fitness for their calling. They lack a knowledge of human nature, and of the motives that actuate men. They have not qualified themselves for their occupation by a practical education.

One Egg for Ten People.

One ostrich egg for ten guests is the pattern at the California ostrich farm.

"One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten," said Dwight Whiting, counting the guests he had invited to spend the day at the ostrich farm with him. "I guess that one egg will be enough."

Having given utterance to this expression, he wended his way to the paddock, and soon brought to the house an ostrich egg. For a whole hour it was boiled, and though there was then some misgiving as to its being cooked, the shell was broken, for curiosity could no longer be restrained, and a three-pound hard-boiled egg laid upon the plate. But aside from its size there was nothing peculiar about it. The white had a bluish tinge seen in duck eggs, and the yolk was of the usual color. It tasted as it looked—like a duck egg—and had no flavor peculiar to itself. But it was immense! As it takes twenty-eight hen eggs to equal in weight the ostrich egg which was cooked, it is evident that the host knew what he was about in cooking only one. There was enough and to spare; and before leaving the table the party unanimously agreed that ostrich egg was good.

Few Rich Men in California.

The majority of people in this State are not rich. There was a time when the glamour of wealth seemed to be over all the state. There are not so many rich people in California to day in proportion to the population as there are in each one of the older States of the Union. There is less warrant for costly living or for domestic expenditures on the scale of prospective fortunes. Looking to the future, one might inquire what are the prospective sources of wealth? There are no more great fortunes to be made in railway construction, few or no great fortunes to be made in mining ventures, the stock boards are no longer prominent. Only the slow processes of wealth are left—agriculture, manufactures, and in, dustrial pursuits generally, which are most fitting for a people who are not wealthy but who have not yet quite forgotten the lives of their fathers and mothers—the domestic economy by means of which large families were well brought up, educated, and sent out into the world to make their own way successfully.—San Francisco Bulletin.

The Bursting Force of a Boiler.

Few people conceive how powerful is the force imprisoned in the interior of a steam boiler when in active operation The steam gauge shows a pressure of perhaps 100 pounds per square inch, and the uninitiated spectator who works or walks carelessly beside the apparatus, may imagine that 100 pounds represents the force with which its fragments would be propelled in case of an explosion. But the whole force of the live steam in a boiler is equivalent to the area of the entire internal surface of the boiler multiplied by the pressure per square inch.

Suppose, for example, the internal length of the boiler is 240 inches and its diameter sixty-six inches, and that the steam guage shows a pressure of 100 pounds. A mathematical calculation shows that the total internal area of the boiler is 36,605 square inches, and hence the imprisoned agent is not 100 pounds, but 36 605x100 pounds, or 3 660,500 pounds. Think of that the next time you hear of the employment of an incompetent engineer to handle a boiler whose explosion is liable to send half a dozen men to eternity!

A helping word to one in trouble is often like a switch on a railroad track—but one inch between wreck and smooth-rolling prosperity.

MARKDALE JULY. 17, 1884.

The Boom Continues.

Our enterprising townsman Mr. Hull, has purchased and is putting into his steam stave-factory a shingle machine and leader, both of which will be in full operation the first of next week. Mr. H. has engaged two more hands in the cooper business. He is doing an extensive business this summer and expects to greatly enlarge it when the two roller mills get into full operation and commence to ship flour.

Personals.

Rev. Mr. Grandy and family arrived this week.

Mrs. J. R. Trimble returned home last week.

Mrs. Wright Sr. is visiting friends in the neighborhood of Flesherton, and Markdale, and is this week visiting her Son in Collingwood, the old lady looks hale and hearty, and has lost none of her cheerful disposition.

Mr. Jas. Steene and wife of Latona called on friends here this week.

Prof. Henry is back to Markdale.

Wes. Whitby left on Tuesday for Manitowaning.

Mrs. Rutherford and daughter of Hamilton are visiting at Mr. Turner's.

Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Richardson of Toronto are spending their holidays with their uncle, R. C. Bryden.

Mr. Truss has gone North to spend his holidays in Owen Sound and vicinity.

Mrs. Wm. Haskett is visiting friends in Blyth, Ont.

Master Wm. Douglas is home from Mt. Forest High School.

Mr. W. H. Steinhoff, of Dundalk gave us a call Tuesday.

Mr. Louis N. Thibaudeau returned from the North on Tuesday.

W. K. Flesher, Esq., Ex. M. P. returned to Flesherton last week from England.

Mrs. Alex Kay has almost recovered her recent protracted illness.

Dr. Armstrong arrived from Port Arthur Wednesday.

The 12th at Williamsford.

Notwithstanding the dreary and threatening aspect of the weather during the first part of the day, a large number turned out at Williamsford station to celebrate the Battle of the Boyne. Early in the afternoon close to one thousand people had gathered; the Orangemen as well as others were highly pleased with the treatment they received at the hands of mine host, Mr. Vogan, who had made ample provision for the wants of the inner man. The majority of the crowd repaired after dinner to the grove adjoining the village, where John Lyons, Esq., of Markdale, gave an able and comprehensive address on orangeism, Mr.——— of the Sauble also addressed the audience with a few well chosen remarks. About 4 o'clock the company dispersed after an orderly and enjoyable day's outing.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR.—The Priceville Public School Examination took place on June 27th. The school room was tastefully decked with flowers and green boughs, by the pupils and teachers. A lengthy programme was successfully carried out under the direction of Mr. Dixon, Teacher, of Sr. Department; and Miss Nicholl, Teacher of the Jr. Department. The larger pupils were examined at length in the various branches of their studies by Wm. Stell ex-Teacher, Revs. Edmonds and McLoud, the afternoon closed with recitations, dialogues, singing &c., by the children of both departments. The attendance of parents was tolerably good, quite a number turned out and were much gratified with the progress being made by the school in general, which reflects great credit on the Teachers. Several short addresses were made by the gentlemen present, encouraging teachers to further efforts and scholars to greater progress, and during the next half year we expect a much greater advance. The next examination, we hope to see a larger turnout and a real good time, and Priceville school will stand second to none in the Township.

JUDSONVILLE, July 3rd.

To the Worthy Master, Officers and Members of Grey Division Grange No. 2.

We your com., on Temperance beg leave to repor. That in view of the Scot Act being about to be submitted to the Electors of this County, and from our opinion of the said act in the Counties in which it has been passed, your com. would recommend that this Division, pledge their support in favor of said Act, and that the Secry. be requested to furnish the leading papers in the County with a copy of this report. Adopted.

J. J. GRAHAM,
Chairman.

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

Proton and Osprey appealed against the County valuation. The investigation begins to-day in Owen Sound before the County Judge.

We had a frost on Monday night, but no damage is reported.

Rev. E. Shaw, the Jr. Minister for the Methodist church on this circuit, arrived on Saturday last.

At the Shrigley pic-nic on Thursday last, Mr. Bailey, Junr., met with an accident by falling from the merry-go-round, breaking his leg at the ankle.

On Wednesday night of last week an infant child, abandoned by its parents, was left at the door of Rev. Mr. Burwash of Horning's Mills. The Reeve of Melancthon, promptly gave it in charge of a nurse. It is thought that the mother wishing to abandon it left it there in the hope that it would be kindly cared for.

355 persons left Dundalk station to take in the celebration of the 12th in Shelburne.

Pic-nics are the rule. The thing is now getting stale, and no doubt will soon give us a rest.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

The 12th of July passed off quietly in this place this year, the sound of Fife and Drum and the march of the Orangemen enlivened our streets for a while in the morning and as it was almost midnight e'er the men and music returned, but few were out to witness the procession pass through. One good brother with the fine whose wind we suppose had failed him had ceased from his labors and fallen from the ranks, but his companion with the Drum sticks failed not in his duty and it could not be said, not a sound of the Drum was heard.

The Ice Cream Social under the auspices of Flesherton Division Sons of Temperance which was held in the Town Hall last Wednesday evening, was fairly successful, there was ice-cream in abundance, an interesting program was gone through with, and a very pleasant evening was spent. Dr. Christoe occupied the chair. Temperance is on the march forward in this locality and that order which is weilding a mighty influence for Temperance, and for good throughout the world to-day; The Sons of Temperance has one of its flourishing and successful divisions sustained and efficiently worked in our enterprising and temperance village. Weekly, members are being added to the Society, and the practice of the principles of Love, Purity and Fidelity are daily being demonstrated. W. K. Flesher Esq., after a long absence from our village, in the old country, arrived home here safely on Monday last. He looks hale and hearty as ever We welcome him back to our midst again.

Miss T. Hind has opened up an Ice Cream parlor in this village, and is now doing a flourishing business. All the refreshing and cooling beverages of the season can be had which is very pleasant and convenient during the sultry Summer.

R. M. Commings Esq., Carpenter of this village leaves this week for Atcheson, Kansas, he is going to join some of his fellow tradesmen who have gone before, and report pastures very green in the west we. Wish friend Commings a safe journey and every success when he gets there.

Fire in Priceville.

Sunday night last Mr. James Tryon's cooper and wagon shop was destroyed by fire loss about $800, partially insured. Cause of fire unknown.

The Chatsworth correspondent to the O. S. Advertiser says: "On Thursday last a thievish old tramp struck the village, and before any notice was taken of him he had stolen a number of small articles from different places and disposed of them in others. About thirty of the young men of the village caught him near the station, dragged him over to the slaughter house, tied the cattle rope round his middle, and swung him up to the roof with the windless. After alternately swinging and questioning him for about an hour, and exacting a promise from him never to return and to caution all tramps against visiting Chatsworth, he was allowed to go, which he did in double quick time. Mr. Joseph Duffey superintended the hanging."

VALUABLE FARM FOR SALE.

A splendid farm for sale two miles from the rising town of Markdale, an important station on the Toronto, Grey & Bruce division of the C. P. R. Being lots No. 108 2nd and 108 & 109 in 3rd range West of T., & S. Road. Glenelg, Co. Grey, containing 150 acres. The farm is admirably adapted for grain or stock and especially for the latter, is watered by a beautifull never failing stream of spring water. There is 110 acres cleared and is in a good state of cultivation, well fenced with cedar rails, balance hard wood with sufficient cedar for fencing the place, also a comfortable house, with splendid well adjoining, good out buildings, young orchard bearing. This is a most desirable farm for stock raising. Title indisputable, for further particulars and terms apply to EDWARD RUTLEDGE, on the premises, Markdale P. O., or to STANDARD Office, Markdale. 200 4

Another choice lot of Side Pork, Smoked Hams, Cheese, Bologna, Sausage, &c., just arrived to day at Benson's Liquor Store.

The magical power over pain that Hagyard's Yellow Oil possesses, outrivals the marvels of ancient times. It acts in a natural manner to subdue inflammation; cures Rheumatism, Croup, Deafness, Sore Throat, and painful injuries.

Alex. Nelson, of Dundalk, has bought the store and premises now occupied by McDonald Bros. for $2600. He expects to be up about the 20th inst.—Manitoulin Expositor.

The Editor of the Manitoulin Expositor longs for single blessedness. He appears to think he could remedy, in a measure, the migration of the young ladies of his town.

If you should be so unfortunate as to Burn Scald or Wound yourself in any way the proper thing to keep clean and heal it is McGregor & Parke's Carbolic Cerate. Insist on having, and be sure you get, McGregor & Parke's Carbolic Cerate. Price 25 cents. Hill Bro's. has the genuine. J. & P. 2

The Editor of the Chronicle and Advance waxeth wroth with each other and the latter appears to feel some what pugilistic. We would suggest to them another pull at the pipe, that peace may be restored.

Lardine Machine Oil, is the delight of farmers, and a pleasure to all men using Machinery, it cannot be excelled, it has received the highest awards at Dominion and Provincial Exhibitions. McCall Bros. & Co., sole manufacturers, Toronto.

Markdale was almost entirely deserted the 12th July, a large number having taken the train for Shelburne and a greater number to Williamsford Station, leaving neither business or pleasure for our village.

New Law Firm.—Hands and Perry, successors to Lauder and Hands, 16 King St. East, Toronto. See card in another column. This popular firm will doubtless continue to receive an extensive patronage from Grey Co.

65 bushels of wheat to the acre might be cut by using Hamilton's Maston grain cradle. Farmers don't fail to examine them, great improvement this season, every cradle will swing so easy and hang so well that it will make the old man feel young again to get hold of one of them. Ask your store keeper for them and take no other.

Farmers in the neighborhood of Markdale are in the midst of their Haying, the crop will be an average one, fall wheat, what little is left is a fine crop, while spring grain and roots are looking well and will be a full average yield.

Safe Removal.—Mr. McComb moved Mr. Mark Armstrong's barn 49 rod, leaving it on its foundation in three and a half days. The barn is 36 x 40 feet and eleven years old and is none the worse for the journey.

The Fastest Yet.—The steamship Athabaska arrived down at 5:30 a. m. on Tuesday, having made the fastest trip on record from Port Arthur to Owen Sound. The new boats are all fast, but the Athabaska downs them all. Her new wheel is a hummer.—Advertiser.

Voters' Lists.—Glenelg voters' list was published from this office last week, Holland list this week, and we will have Osprey list in the hands of the Clerk before next week's paper is out. There are 200 copies of each with upwards of 30 pages. What country office will surpass this.

Lawn Party.—A garden party under the auspices of the Presbyterian Ladies Aid will be held in the premises adjoining the Presbyterian Church on the evening of the 23rd inst., (Wednesday next). Refreshments will be provided and a pleasant time may be expected. Admission 15 cents.

Another Burglary.—On Saturday night, 25th June, Benson's Liquor Store in this village was broken into through the outside cellar door and a quantity of bottled and other liquor taken together with eatables and drinkables. There is no clue to the gluttonous burglar.

A Tight Squeeze.—On Thursday last while attending the masons on Benson's building in this place Mr. Len Cot was in a stooped posture lifting his load of brick when a large pile alongside tumbled over on him, almost completely burying him. The brick-layers hastened to his rescue and after about fifteen minutes hard labor extricated Len. from his perilous condition, not much the worse for his tight squeeze.

For lath, lumber, flooring, sash and doors, go to Grant & Co. Markdale.

For sale cheap a quantity of good flour. Reynolds and Son.

Good quality is what is cheap, you get it every time at Brander's, Priceville.

Grant & Co. keeps a fine line of sideboards, dressing cases, sofas &c.

Markdale cheese factory sold and shipped this week 300 boxes of cheese.

Cradles for the dear little ones, at Grant & Co's. See them even you don't want one yet.

About fifteen pair of Markdale young people had a pic-nic to Eugenia Falls on Wednesday. A very pleasant time was spent.

Tinware almost given away at Reynolds and Son.

An excursion from Orangeville and intermediate stations to Owen Sound will be run by the Railway Co. shortly. Fare from Markdale and return 40 cents.

We are now offering our entire stock at cost. Reynolds and Son.

Where did you get that nice print Mrs. S——Why from Mrs. Brander av course and it is chape too, an be dad the best of it is, it is good intirely to wash and wear.

Do not fail to give us a call and secure good bargains. Reynolds and Son.

Our esteemed friend Dr. Armstrong stopped off a few hours Wednesday on his way south from Port Arthur. We understand he will return next week with a partner. They will spend a few days in Markdale on their way North.

We guarantee to sell cheaper than any house in town. Reynolds & Son.

Miss McIntyre left this week for her home in Markdale. She will be missed by a number of very warm friends whom her engaging manner won during her short stay among us.—Manitoulin Expositor.

Now that haying will be on in a few days, there will be a certain amout of the crature wanted. When you come into town, come straight to Benson's, he can give you better value for your money than any one in town, and then you are sure to a good drop; and every thing in his line is just the same way.

Toronto.—Few people are aware how Toronto is spreading to the west. The opening of the Toronto and Quebec line will give them some inkling of it. Round the station at the railway junction some five miles from the Union Station, a suburb will soon rise which promises to grow speedily into a town. The station house being erected is quite a formidable affair. The dining-room can seat a hundred people, the ladies' and gentlemen's rooms are all first-class. The round house will have accommodation for 44 engines. Altogether it is going to be a big place.

Markdale Jewellery.—You will find no better stock, either for quality of goods, or variety, in the Watch, Clock and Jewellery line in this county than our Markdale Jeweller keeps, and what is even more important, you can depend on getting full value for your money. You may have paid twice the value of such goods elsewhere and at the same time have an idea when making your purchase that you were making a good bargain. Mr. Brown does not do business in this way but in all cases giving the best value. We can therefore freely recommend the public to patronize W. A. Brown, Markdale Watchmaker.

Wedding Bells.—There was a scene of orange blossoms in the air on Wednesday. That morning was twitnessed the nuptials of Miss Sadie Crawford and Mr. W. J. Speer, formerly of Markdale, and now of Alexandria, Minn. The bride being the eldest daughter of our respected Postmaster, while the groom was also well known in town, the event was looked forward to with interest, and a very large party of guests assembled at the residence of the bride's father to witness the ceremony, which was performed by the Rev. J. Howell, M. A. The wedding presents were numerous and costly, and included a handsome purse from the father of the bride. The happy couple left to take the afternoon train, on their wedding tour, amidst many congratulations and well wishes.—Sun Times.

"MAY DEW"

The Great French Lotion for Beautifying the Face.

It controls the evidence of age. One application will make the most stubbornly red and rough hands beautifully soft and white. Remember that "MAY DEW" is not a paint or powder that fills up the pores of the skin, and that is injurious to the skin, but a new and great discovery, a vegetable liquid, that causes the cheek to glow with health, the neck, arms and hands to rival the Lily in whiteness. Impossible to detect in the beauty it confers any artificial character. It cures greasy Skin, Freckles, Wrinkles, Pimples, Black Heads, Crow's Feet, Blotches, Face Grubs, Sun Burn, Tan, Ringworm, Chapped Hands, Sore or Chapped Lips, Barber's Itch, Tetter, etc. It frees the pores, oil glands, and tubes from the injurious effects of powders and cosmetic washes. By its use all redness and roughness are prevented; it beautifies the skin, and will make it soft, smooth and white; imparting a delicious softness; imparting a perfectly healthy, natural and youthful appearance. The best face lotion that the world ever produced. We will send "A large bottle" to any address on receipt of price, $1. When ordering mention this paper

THE VANISHING MAORIS.

Recollections of a Brave, Intelligent Race of People.

When I was in Australasia, twenty years ago, three of the aborigines of Van Diemen's Land were in existence; but as they were pretty old and unacquinted with the laws of hygiene, I have no doubt they have passed away long since. There is also another and a nobler race in the southern hemisphere disappearing slowly but surely before the march of civilization. The Maoris of New Zealand numbered more than 100,000 in 1861. There are not more than 30,000 to-day. Fifty years hence they will have followed the unhappy natives of Tasmania, and some poet whose father stole their lands or sold them rum will no doubt bewail their melancholy fate with the proper degree of regret and pathos.

And more is the pity, for the Maoris are a noble race. They are unlike any other people in Oceanica, or perhaps in the world, and how their ancestors settled in New Zealand, or whence they came is a problem not yet solved. A canoe is the largest vessel they knew anything of till the British came, and it is unlikely this frailest of boats could cover the 1,000 miles separating the island from New Holland. Besides, they are altogether a superior race, physically and mentally, to the wretched aborigines of the Australian continent, and hence cannot be descended from them. The Maoris themselves have a theory which, if accepted, offers a simple solution of the problem. Typo, a combination of god and demon, seated himself astride of a cloud one rainy day and fished. It was long before he got a bite, but it was heavy when it came, as it did after four hours of patience and perseverance. He pulled away at his line for four hours more, and when the object in tow came close enough for him to see it he was disgusted and angry to find that his hook had caught in the earth and it was a tall, straight mountain he had drawn up. This mountain is called Rangariri. In a great rage Typo flew along the clouds for a hundred miles and fished once more. but the same luck attended his efforts, and he pulled up another straight, tall mountain which he called Tuaranga, known to Europeans as Egmont. These two mountains can now be seen from all parts of the island, and are covered with snow the year around. Typo lives on one by day and the other at night. It is from fissures on the side of Rangariri that the male Maoris originally emerged, and the ancestor of King Tamihana, now in London begging justice for the people, was the first. The females came from Tuaranga. This theory has the merit of simplicity, at all events.

When I was at New Zealand, in 1860, the natives were in a flourishing condition. They cultivated the lands, they raised stock, dressed well, were generally educated, and the great chiefs were beginning to send their sons to Oxford and Cambridge. Intermarraiges between the English and Maoris were common, and the latter did not consider themselves honored by any means with the alliances. The Maoris are a brown race, above the middle size, active, enduring and brave to rashness. Some of their women are very beautiful, and all make devoted wives when they learn what wives should be. When the Maoris have become extinct as a race the dash of blood they will have left among their conquerors, or rather exterminators, will be of use to them in their attempts at supremacy.

They were too flourishing. The eye of the land-grabber was turned upon them. Was it not too bad that white men, half pay army and navy officers, and other superior beings, should be cooped up here and there in towns and villages while the niggers were living on the fat of the land? Then began encroachments. The Maoris held their lands on the tribal system, as of old did the Scotch and Irish. This was the mode used to rob them: A settler would get hold of a poor, shiftless tribesman, and for a keg of rum and a few pounds of tobacco induce him to sign over a block of fifty or a hundred thousand acres of fine land, which, of course, the tribesman had no right to do. The next move of the land shark was to take a posse of men with him and begin surveying the property. The chief would scornfully expel those men, and as he owed no allegeance to England's Queen, would clip the ears of the shark. That was enough. The shark appealed for justice to the Government at Auckland or Wellington, and as the members of the Government were land hungry themselves, they would send a company of soldiers to build a blockhouse and occupy the territory in dispute. In this manner block after block of land of land was wrested from the Maoris; who never united against the common foe until the lands of King Potatu, father of King Tamihana, was seized. These lands of the King locked in the Bay of Kawia, one of the finest and most beautiful harbors in the world.

It was then, however, too late. The British had obtained too firm a hold. The struggle lasted seven years, during which time the Maoris suffered, but often inflicted disastrous defeats. They had never more than 4,000 men in the field at any one time. while opposed to them were Gen. Cameron and his 10,000 regular soldiers, a native Maori contingent, 5,000 European volunteers, and several gunboats which steamed up the river and shelled the native forts. Badly armed and equipped as were the Maoris, they never met the British in equal numbers that they didn't whip them badly. Rewi and Wiremu were the leaders in this patriotic war, his Majesty Potatu being nothing but a drunken sot whose throne was a barrel of rum. Rewi was a poet, and is so still for aught I know. It was he who composed the song beginning:

How happy were we ere the Pakeha came,
  Ere his rum and his Bibles we knew,
A piece of flax green formed a robe for my queen
  And her beauty was made of tattoo.

Wiremu, or William Thompson, had travelled, and was acquainted with the might of the British empire. He had been educated in Oxford, and rumor said he was the son of Sir George Grey by a Maori mother. Be that as it may, he threw off his fine clothes and gold watch when the war broke out, and took up the flaxen mat, the war dress of his race, and the rifle and tomahawk. The Maoris were ultimately vanquished, as much by rum and religion as by force of arms. The missionaries got in among them and preached peace, while the countrymen of the missionaries were killing and robbing them in all directions. The Maoris fought for the most part in paths or forts, but came out in the open when goaded to madness by the fanatic priests who arose among them toward the close of the war, and told them that they were invincible. They are natural engineers. They selected their position on a mountain top, dug rows of trenches around it, and surrounded the whole with a palisading of felled trees. The space outside this they cleared, so that an enemy could not find cover while attacking them. I was among a party of 1,000 which attacked one of their positions at a place called Ottapawa at 4 o'clock one morning in January, 1866. To gain a point within musket shot of the position we had to march five miles through brush. At last we deployed upon a plateau in front of a well fortified pah. The plateau was as level as a billiard board. We could see the Maoris in the trenches, with finger on trigger and muzzle pointed upward. We could see the whites of their eyes as we advanced, and we could hear the twitter of the birds in the trees overhead. They never spoke and never fired till we got so close that every shot told. Indeed, so close were we that the powder from the Maoris' muskets flew into our eyes. We broke and fled. I think we ran seven miles, but the Maoris did not follow, and that is where they always lost the benefit of their victory. It is a fine thing to have a General who can write eloquent despatches, for we found out afterwards that we did not run away at all; we merely took ground to our right.

The British are now so completely in possession that the Society for the Protection of Aborigines think the time has arrived to protect the poor Maoris. Blessings on the philanthropists of Exeter and Shaftesbury Halls, they always do open their venerable eyes when the business is done,

The Maoris are a hospitable people. When they invite you to their pah, they invite you to all it contains, barring nothing—fish, potatoes, wives, daughters, and everything. Their cooking is simple. They dig a large hole in the ground, line it with stones, build a fire, and afterwards throw in the fish and potatoes. After a few hours they have a feast fit for the gods. These hot stones answer another purpose in war. Each tribe or village has a supply of them always on hand, and when danger approaches water is thrown upon the hot stones, and steam thus obtained, which, ascending above the trees is repeated from village to village, and warns the people that an enemy is approaching.

At festivals, after triumphs, before engaging in battle, or when a distinguished stranger honors their pah with a visit, the Maoris indulge in a war dance. They range themselves in a circle, and, taking the cue from the chief in the centre, slap their left thighs with the left hands, press the right thigh with the elbow, lift their tomahawks on high, and then spring into the air with a terrific yell. They do this until their eyes flame and flash and their hair stands on end. It is very grotesque very exciting, and to some, very fascinating.

All the Maoris travel on horseback, and it is not uncommon to see their women riding side-saddle coming into the European towns in the height of fashion, though it must be confessed the effect is somewhat impaired by the habit they have of smoking short dhudeens under their veils. When going home in the evening they sway somewhat in the saddle, probably owing to the quantity of rum they have imbibed. Women are free in New Zealand, and it is not considered extraordinary when a buxom Maori girl makes love in the open to an Auckland swell with blonde moustache. They are Christians, too, in their own way, and certainly they should be when the hundreds of tons of Scripture literature sent to them every year from England is considered. When their villages were taken the houses were found to be half full of Bibles printed in the Maori language. They used them for wadding and lighting their fires. The Maoris have a simple language of their own, composed of about a thousand words, which can be learned in a month by the European of application and intelligence. Everything in the shape of liquor is called "wai" in the way of eatables "kai." A sow pig is called "wyanna." The Queen of England being a female is styled the "Great Wyanna." not thereby meaning the great pig but the great woman.

This interesting people is passing away, and in half a century hence the world will know them no more. The traveller from New Zealand who is to sketch St. Paul's from a broken arch of London Bridge, will not be a Maori. He may not, however, be of as good a race. Rum, war, and diseases introduced by their Christain conquerors are decimating them annually. There is some excuse for exterminating the Indians who are nomads and require a continent for a hunting ground. There is none for exterminating the Maori, who are an agricultural people, able and willing to partake of the higher blessings of civilization. But then their lands are very fine and fair to see.

Whipping a Criminal.

An English correspondent writes: We entered a long, low, room, ignorant of furniture except a sort of press against one wall and a long deal table by the other. What I likened to a press was the whipping apparatus with stocks for the prisoner's feet and holdfasts for his hands. He stepped into this apparatus, and his feet were forthwith imprisoned. Extending his arms, he placed them in the crescent hollow of a plank before him, another plank was let down, and both his wrists were pinioned in rings. These rings were lined with india rubber to prevent his hurting himself in the constriction of his agony. I walked behind the table and a coat beside an elderly man. A short-handled whip, not unlike a hunting crop, with nine lashes of closely-plaited thongs and nine knots on each, lay on it.

"Is this the cat-o'-nine tails of which we hear so much?" I asked.

"That's it," said the elderly man, in a wheezy voice.

"It does not seem to me so formidable a weapon as I expected."

"Heh! It tickles 'em all thh same, as you'll presently see."

The first prisoner was brought in—a sullen, burly, thick-skinned brute with an evil forehead. His shirt was pulled over his head, and he was fastened into the whipping apparatus. The elderly man deliberately took off his coat, rolled up his sleeves, lifted the cat and stepped over to a position behind the naked back of the prisoner. The elderly man was the late Mr. Calcraft. Mr. Jones, Dr. Gibson and the sheriff stood behind the hangman. Mr. Jones gave the words, "One, two, three," for the hangman to strike: Dr. Gibson watched that nature should not be subjected to too severe a strain; the sheriff superintending the function.

I am not going to give a graphic description of the flogging here. The ruffian bore it well. He closed his teeth at first, but he had to groan and draw deep respirations eventually, and to evade the descending blow he curved in his back like a patient in an epileptic fit.

"There ain't no use a doing o' that. You'll only ketch it worse," said Calcraft.

"Silence, and proceed with the sentence," gruffly exclaimed Mr. Jones

At a flogging match, as an affair of honor, it appears no talking is permitted on the ground. Soon there was a bend sinister on the skin. By gradation it was furrowed with ridges fiery scarlet then blue, then a verdigris tint, inclining in oozy pimples here and there in an angry purple, but still no blood was drawn in spurts, and no jagged shreds of flesh sent up to the roof Who said that lied. The legal butcher did his work adroitly. He did not stun the criminal by consecutive lashes on one spot, but he plied the scourge airily, as a fly-catcher would his line, distributing its favors discriminatingly over the entire hide.

There were other miscreants flagellated, and then we came into the cold air of the morning, and I had leisure to look at Calcraft—a low sized man with a shuffling gait, a sallow complexion, a sordid expression, a face with no more emotion in it than an unpainted wall, a stumpy nose under dull, glassy eyes, and over a broken colonnade of yellow, rotten teeth—a man with the decrepitude of age, but none of its sweet benevolent characteristics.

"Do you recollect a friend of mine with whom you had an interview one Monday morning?" the pleasant sheriff asked. "He was in my employ and a decidedly good workman Tom O Styles."

"He a friend of yourn, sir?" said the indignant hangman. "I don't believe it. Why, he was no good; he was a wilful murderer." And the auditors in that jail-yard laughed.

"Gentlemen, I persume you're peckish," said the cheery sheriff. "I've ordered them to prepare our breakfast in one of the rooms over the central criminal court, and I shall be most happy if you will all join me."

Before we left, the late Mr. Calcart eagerly and somewhat querulously clutched at the sheriff, complaining that it was customary for those who came to his performance for the first time to give him a tip. The sheriff gave him a crown piece. Nobody followed the example.

Feathers and Flies in India.

I have had rare opportunities of collecting feathers, and I have many times begun a collection—only to abandon it, however, owing to the plague of insects and other causes. In the Straits of Malacca I collected the feathers of the Argus pheasants, of several birds of paradise, (sold by Malays from Celebes and other islands,) of the imperial pigeon, the toucan, and many other strange birds, such as would rejoice the heart of a fisherman on a wet day with a heavy spate in the river, and nothing to do but overhaul his fly-book But a plague on white ants, carpenters wasps, and such like creatures!—my beautiful feathers of all the colors in the rainbow went into their omnivorous stomachs, and in many cases not even the bare quills remained to me. That some of them ought to have proved killing in a Scotch or Irish stream is indicated by the fact of a mere bunch of these gaudy feathers tied with a bit of twine to a hook, having caught a big yellow nondescript fish in one of the many rivers in the Malay Peninsula. An Indian collection shared the same fate, for there is nothing that Indian pooches—hateful word—seem so fond of as feathers. It is next to impossible to keep tied flies in India. To say nothing of the climatic influences separating the gut from the hook, pooches,—Anglices insects—revel on the wings and bodies; nothing coming amiss to them—pig's wool or resin. I was once fool enough to purchase a dazzling collection of so called "mahseer flies." They were as big as the argus moth, and much resembled a collection of tropical butterflies in a glass-case. What they cost I am ashamed to say. Suffice it to say that. if I could sell at the prices I bought at I would instantly take to feather collecting as one of the most profitable occupations in the world. But what was my dismay to find that all the mahseer I ever saw would not look at, much less take a fly. There may be eccentrics among that fish—indeed in some places they will take the Indian fig and bits of plaintain—but as the rule, they disdain the fly-maker's art, preferring spoons and phantoms. Well all that dazzling assortment of lures for the unsophisticated "mahseer" went to the pooches, and along with it went bundles of the glorious golden and black feathers of the florikan, the blues of the roller and the king-fisher, the yellow of the oriole, the rich grays of demoiselle crane, the harl of the peacock, the dapple of the jungle cock and the blue-winged teal, the crest of the hoopoe, the pink of the flamingo, the green of the parrot, the scarlet tail feathers of the little Andaman "polly," and many others proved in fly-trying, or only fanciful. The finer the feather the greater the destruction. But it would be possible, I dare say, with the help of friendly sportsmen on the Himalayas and in Burmah, to make such a collection of Indian feathers as would astonish the trade at home. The feathers would have to be soldered down in tin cases, and should be carefully cleaned and dusted with camphor before being placed in the cases —The London Field.

Weaving Nettles.

The common stinging nettle was formerly used largely in Germany as a material for the making of woven fabrics, as is proved by the name of nesseltuch, or nettle cloth, still applied to muslin. Prof. Reuleaux, the representative of the German manufacturers at the Philadelphia Exhibition, advised experiments with the nettle with a view to the production of native yarn. The matter was taken up by a lady, who planted nettles for the purpose upon a barren part of her estate, and, in 1877, was able to exhibit nettle fibres in all stages of preparation. Thereupon hundreds of people in Germany, Belgium, Hungary, Poland, Sweden, Switzerland, and Austria commenced the cultivation of the nettle, and two years later the first German manufactory devoted to this industry was opened at Dresden. A yarn has now been produced which fulfils all requirements; but the Chinese nettle gives the best results, yielding a fine, glossy yarn of greater strength than that made from the common nettle. The fibre is therefore known as China grass.

SCIENTIFIC GOSSIP.

In the Zeitschrift fur Analytsche Chemis Dr. H Schwarz draws attention to the curious fact that a pale phosphorescent glow often occurs in the drying of gunpowder.

A tube containing a mixture of triethylamine and water exhibits turbidity at a temperature of 26° C. Noting this fact, Prof. J. H. Poynting considers that such tubes may prove useful in indicating the temperature of fever patients.

The Chamber of Commerce, Plymouth, England, has been corresponding with Lloyds and the Trinity House regarding the feasibility of forming a telegraphic connection between the Eddystone Lighthouse and the mainland by means of a cable.

New South Wales has made rapid progress in electric telegraphy. In 1873 there were but 6,521 miles of wire, 105 telegraph stations, and 365,360 messages sent. In 1882 the mileage had increased to 15,901, the stations to 345, and the number of messages sent to 1,965,931.

Manganese in appreciable quantity has been found by M. E. J. Mamnene in thirty-four samples of wine. Tests also revealed its presence in various cereals. As it can be detected also in nearly every description of rock the above facts go to prove the wide diffusion of this metal throughout nature.

The Compagnie Belge and Hollandise de l'Electricite have been trying street cars provided with 108 Faure accumulators, weighing less than two tons, the total weight of the car being under five tons. Although the grades were very sharp the expectations of the company were fully answered.

Sawdust when used as a substitute for sand in house plastering is alleged to impart very desirable properties to the plaster. It makes the covering for walls light, warm, and porous. By its non-conducting qualities it causes the inner surface to retain the heat. which sand plaster allows to escape.

Mr. Crisp showed at a recent meeting of the Microscopical Society, London, a very curious microscope bearing the date 1772. Besides possessing other peculiarities, it had three objectives attached to a sliding plate at the end of a nosepiece in a manner similar to that adopted in the construction of the modern Harbey and other microscopes.

Dry pocket-glue is made of 12 parts of good glue and 5 parts of sugar. The glue is boiled until it is entirely dissolved. the sugar is then put into the glue and the mass is evaporated until it hardens on cooling. Lukewarm water melts it very readily, and it is excellent in use in causing paper to adhere firmly, cleanly, and without producing any disagreeable odor.

A simple way to ascertain whether a sample of petroleum is dangerous or not has been recommended by a chemist of considerable standing. An ordinary tumbler is filled two-thirds full with the oil. While filling up the remaining one-third with boiling water a flame is held over the vessel. If the vapor which rises takes fire the test indicates that the petreleum is not safe to be exposed to the atmosphere.

At a meeting of the Berlin Medical Society lately photographs were shown by Prof. Virchow of the gigantic plane trees in the Island of Cos, under the shade of which Hippocrates is said by tradition to have held medical examinations. The tree stands in the market-place of the town of Cos, on the east side of the island, and the branches, which spread over nearly the whole area of the market-place, are supported by marble pillars.

German experimenters report that Caucasian petroleum is not a good lubricant for machinery. Its properties as an illuminant however, are of a high order, and with a suitable burner excellent results should be obtained. The point of ignition is high, and this oil is therefore much less liable to give rise to explosions than most kinds of petroleum. During combustion the Caucasian variety only slightly carbonizes the wick of a lamp.

Prof. Scheibler, of Berlin, has invented a process for the production of phosphoric acid from the slag made in the Thomas-Gilchrist method. The slag, having been roasted in an oxidizing flame, is pulverized and sifted. The powder is dissolved in hydrochloric acid, and the solution saturated with lime-water. The resulting product containsfrom 35 to 37 per cent. of phosphoric acid in the form of bibasic phosphate of lime, and a second roasting yields a substance in which the content of phophoric acid is as high as 45 per cent.

A description is given in the English Mechanic of what appears to be novel electric bell. The battery is contained in a cylinder of brass, inside which the line wire can be coiled by turning a little winch handle, and the gong is carried at one end of the brass case, serving as a cover for the magnet, &c. The case is provided with legs, so that the arrangement can be placed in a horizontal position, and there is also a ring, which enables it to be suspended wherever it may be desired. The outside dimensions of the whole apparatus are 6 inches by 4 inches.

MM. de Meuron and Cuenod, of Genoa, have fitted up the appliances for transmitting 30 horse-power by electrical agency to a distance of nearly 4,000 feet through a copper wire .276 inch in diameter. (No. 2 new gauge,) at the works of MM. Blosch Neuhaus, Biel, Switzerland. The Thury dynamo-electric machines are used. and run at 590 revolutions per minute. These machines are multipolar in the form of a hexagonal prism, the armatures resembling those of the Siemens machines, but differing in the method of coupling the wires.

One of the best electric light systems was recently introduced into the Court Theatre at Stuttgart. Quite unexpectedly the orchestra immediately showed signs that they disapproved of the new means of illumination, and they have petitioned the management to restore the old oil lamps The orchestra state that the brilliancy of the electric lights has an unpleasant effect upon the nerves, and that it has become difficult to follow the baton of the conductor. To ascertain whether there may not be something substantial in these alleged grievances a committee of oculists and disinterested musicians has been officially appointed.

The small shop men, says the Scientific American, are valuable in any shop, where mechanics rather than operatives are required, because they are generally "men at a pinch," "expediency men," and for the most part excellent workmen. The proprietor of a large manufacturing establ[ishment] building fine tools of a particular ch[aracter] claims that his best men come from [small] shops, where makeshifts and contriv[ances] are the rule. "Such men," he says, "[...] make the shop" by their methods. [...] very convenient to have a shop full of [ad]apted tools, but is also convenient to hav[e] the shop graduates from "the little s[hop] who can can contrive as well as tend a [ma]chine.

The Money Value of a Kiss.

At the Lambeth County court on Tues[day] a curious action was tried before Mr. J. [...] Taylor, the Judge, in which a porter na[med] Henry William Pitt sued Dr. Gledhill, [a] surgeon, for the sum of £5 0s. 6d., £5 b[e]ing for an I O U and 6d. for one month's in[terest]. Mr. Groome, the counsel for th[e] plaintiff, stated that the defendant, on the 29th of April kissed the plaintiff's wife, [and] on the 1st of May he signed a document [as] follows: "I O U £5 for having kissed J[ane] Pitt. James Gledhill, May 1, 1884," and [on] the reverse side his signature appeared [to] the following statement: "I hereby [ac]knowledge I have entered into a fair ag[ree]ment between Henry Pitt, Jane Pitt, [and] myself. James Gledhill." An I O U s[tamp] was given for this document.

The defendant said he repudiated his li[a]bility to pay this money, on the ground th[at] the I O U was given as the result of the [in]timidation of the plaintiff, who had thr[eat]ened him with a criminal prosecution if [he] did not compensate him for the assau[lt]. His Honor—and you gave him £5 for a ki[ss]. [Laughter.] The defendant—I gave th[e I] O U on the second of May. His H[onor] said he doubted if there had been any co[n]sideration for the I O U. Mr. Groome [said] the consideration was the solatium for M[r.] Pitt's wounded feelings, for which the pl[ain]tiff could have brought an action. [His] Honor, however, said there was no con[sid]eration, and gave a verdict for defen[dant]. The defendant hurriedly left the court, [evi]dently gratified with the result of the p[ro]ceedings. Mr. Groome asked for the do[cu]ments put in evidence. His Honor—[...] they will be kept an court, and can be [pro]duced, if required, in any proper way. [Mr.] Groome said other proceedings would [be] taken.

How Globes are Built.

This heading has no astronomical mean[ing]; it refers to mechanical manipulation. [...] library and school educational globes ha[ve] perhaps been a puzzle to many an inqui[ring] mind—they being so light, so easily tu[rned] on their axis, and so smooth as to ap[pear] more like natural exact productions [than] mechanical constructions.

The material of a globe is a thick, p[...] paper like soft straw board, and this is [form]ed into two hemispheres from disks. A [...] disk is cut in gores, or radical pieces, f[rom] center to circumference, half of the g[ores] being removed and the others brought [to]gether, forming a hemispherical cup. T[he] disks are gored under a cutting press, [the] dies of which are so exact that the [gores] come together at their edges to make a p[er]fect hemisphere. The formation is also [done] by a press with hemisperical mould and [die], the edges of the gores being covered [with] glue. Two of these hemispheres are [...] united by glue and mounted on a wire, [the] ends of which are the two axes of the fi[nish]ed globe. All this work is done while [the] paper is in a moist state. After drying, [the] rough paper globe is rasped down to a s[...] face by coarse sand paper, followed by [...] paper, and then receives a coating of [...] or enamel that will take a clean s[...] finish.

The instructive portion is a map of [the] world printed in twelve sections, ea[ch] lozenge shape, the points extending [from] pole to pole, exactly as though the p[eel of] an orange was cut through from stem to [...] in twelve equal divisions. These map[s are] obtained in Scotland generally, alth[ough] there are two or three establishments [else]where which produce them. The pa[per of] these maps is very thin but tenacious, [and] is held to the globe by glue. The ope[rator] —generally a woman—begins at one p[...] pasting with the left hand and laying [the] sheet with the right, working along [...] edge to the north or other pole, coaxing [the] edge of the paper over the curvature of [the] globe with an ivory spatula, and work[ing] down the entire paper to an absol[utely] smooth surface.

As there are no laps to these lozenge[-shaped sec]tions the edges must absolutely meet, [or] there would be a mixed up mess, espe[cially] among the islands of some of the great ar[chi]pelagoes and in the arbitrary political b[ound]ers of the nations. This is probably [the] most exact work in globe making, and [...] it appears to be easy because the ope[rator] is so expert in coaxing down fullnesses [and] in expanding scanty portions, all the [...] keeping absolute relation and perfect [...]ing with the other sections and to [the] edges. The metallic work—the equ[ator], meridians, and stands—are finished by [ma]chinery. A coat of transparent va[rnish] over the paper surface completes the w[ork], and thus a globe is built.

Vertical Flight of Bullets

Experiments have been made in Hart[ford], Conn., with the vertical firing Gatling [...] in the presence of a number of mecha[nics], military men and others interested in [...]nery. The inclination of the piece w[as de]termined by a combined spirit level [and] quadrant. At an inclination of fifte[en de]grees, the time between the discharge [and] the return of the bullets into the riv[er], the banks of which the experiments [were] made, was fifty-nine seconds. On an [...] vertical fire, the time of return was [...] four seconds. The force of the retu[rning] bullets—44 calibre rifle—was suff[icient] to drive them through four inches of [...] boards, enough to render any defen[ce] bombproof untenable against such a [...]er.

They Were in Doubt

A long striped snake crawled into a b[ase]ment saloon yesterday, and was in the [mid]dle of the room before anybody saw it. [...] inmates stood aghast and speechless f[or sev]eral seconds, when one of them, pointi[ng a] finger at the object, managed to artic[ulate] "Do any of the rest of you see that?" [...] responded in a chorus: "Yes, we all [...]" "It's a great relief to me to know it," [said] the first, "for I thought I was going to [have] another attack of malaria." "Me t[oo]" sponded the chorus, and then they [...] the snake with billiard cues and killed [it].

THE DEVICES OF A MASTER THIEF.

Plotting the Woman to Secure the Genuine, and Setting a Trap for Car Fares.

It was a cheerful morning. The boss crook leaned languidly against the door post of a saloon on West street, and eyed with the look of a connoisseur the crowd emerging from the gates of the Pennsylvania ferry house. The assistant crook leaned, not quite so languidly, against the door post of a saloon a little further down the street. His expression was also that of a connoisseur, but it lacked the implicit self-confidence of the boss crook's. There was a little anxiety in his look, as though he were afraid something of importance might escape his view. Vigilance was not such a matter of course with him as with the boss crook. His eyes covered the exits of the New Jersey Central ferry. It is not hazarding much to say that between the boss crook and his assistant not one of the countrymen with fat wallets who might at any time, while the crooks stood sentinel, enter New York from these termini of two great railroads, could escape the vigilance of these apparently unconcerned individuals. They operated with good judgment and on a system. There is no better stand for the business in the city, and joining forces insures accuracy.

As the reporter, who had been to New Jersey, crossed the street, he caught the boss crook's eye, and the boss crook recognizing him, became hilarious.

"I've got a new racket, and I guess you'll think it's a funny one," exclaimed the crook.

"If it's new, hadn't you better keep it awhile?" exclaimed the reporter in an unguarded moment of simple generosity.

"Well," was the reply, "it's been going about a fortnight. It is one of those, though, that pays handsomely while it's going on, but busts in about two weeks. This one's been running just long enough. I'm going to call it in, can it, and keep it in stock for future use. You see a racket that's old enough to be forgotten is about as good a commercial article as a brand new racket. But even if I weren't going to call it in I wouldn't mind telling you. It's a most wonderful thing, but publication don't seem to hurt our business. Our game's about the only thing I know of that don't suffer from exposure. The Umbrellas and Chairs of Lulu Hurst.

For several months Southern papers have been describing the wonderful performances of a young girl known as Lulu Hurst. These reports have stated that she possessed a unique and extraordinary "force."

We were pleased, therefore, to receive recently a very careful and conscientiously written account of this phenomenon from Dr. Seth N. Jordan, of Columbus, Ga. Dr. Jordan states that, in company with Drs. George Grimes and Carlisle Terry, he examined Miss Hurst, and that they all agreed that she is not a fraud, but possesses some extraordinary and occult power. He writes that she is fifteen years of age, five feet four inches high, weighs one hundred and twenty five pounds, is of moderate muscular development, in good general health, has menstruated regularly, is of an intelligent and amiable disposition. She first became aware of the possession of her "force" last September, and it has continued ever since, with the exception of a brief interval when she had a "cold."

Drs. Jordan, Terry, and Grimes, having purchased a new umbrella, experimented with her for four hours in the room of a hotel. The phenomenon developed was somewhat as follows: Two or three scientific persons take hold of the handle of an open umbrella, and hold it fast; Miss Lulu then touches it with her open palm, when, presto! the umbrella is turned inside out, or snatched away despite every effort. Meanwhile other persons find that no muscular contractions have taken place in Lulu's arms.

Three strong and scientific men lift up a chair, and hold it in the air. Lulu places her hand upon it, and it sinks to the floor despite every effort. Dr. Jordan and others took hold of a long stick, the phenomenon touched the other end and it rapidly revolved, or pulled the three experimentalists roughly about the room. Miss Hurst's "force" seems to have a peculiar "penchant" for umbrellas and canes, so that she cannot carry the former article at all, the mystical something snatching it away and leaving her out in the wet.

With the exception of the production of knocks and raps, the above are the chief phenomena exhibited and described.

We fully believe that Dr. Jordan has described them correctly, and that Miss Hurst is a remarkable girl. But there is one feature in her performance which no one, not even Dr. Jordan, seems to have noticed, or at all events carefully studied. This is, that all the exhibitions of her wonderful force are exhibited in opposing voluntary muscular effort in others. This force has no power over dead matter, but only over living, conscious, muscular exertions. This fact explains, we believe, the mysterious energy which the Georgian phenomenon appears to develope. It is the experimenters, not the subject, who knock themselves and umbrellas about. At any rate, the matter ought to be investigated from this standpoint. It will probably be found that Miss Hurst's exhibitions are only another phase of the hypnotic phenomena.—Medical Record.

SONGS OF THE PEOPLE.

Famous Popular Pieces that Sell by the Hundred Thousand.

Stephen C. Foster, the author of 'Old Dog Tray' and 'Old Folks at Home,' was a genuine American, a farmer's boy, who had but limited opportunity for musical instruction: still of his 'Old Folks' fully 1,000,000 copies have been sold, and of his 'Old Dog Tray' 600,000. Besides these his 'Uncle Ned' and 'Suzanna' are favorites. The reason of the popularity of Foster's songs lies in their easy flowing melody, the adherence to plain chords in the accompaniments, and the advoidance of intricacy in the harmony or embarrassing accidentals in the melody. I was present when they buried this sweet singer in Pittsburg in 1846, to the strains of his own song. 'Come Where My Love Lies Dreaming.' It is the simplicity and sweetness of the tune that makes the popular singer, and the same conditions hold good to-day. Henry C Work, a newspaper man, lately deceased, is the author of 'Come Home Father,' and 'Grandfather's Clock'; of each over 200,000 copies have been sold. The famous 'Silver Threads among the Gold,' with as large a sale as the two former together, is by H. P. Danks, an organist. Will S. Hays, another newspaper man, wrote the Songs 'Evangeline,' 'Nora O'Neill,' and 'Shamus O'Brien,' each having a sale of over 100,000 copies. 'Shoo Fly, Don't Bodder me,' 'Put Me In My Little Bed,' and 'Come, Birdie, Come,' are composed by C. A. White, and have been published by the author. Of each of them fully 150,000 copies have been sold. 'Don't be Sorrowful Darling,' and 'Lorena,' are by J. P. Webster, a simple country music teacher, and 'Gathering Shells by the Sea Shore' is by W. S. Thompson, each song having a sale of over 300,000. 'Leaf by Leaf the Roses Fall,' and 'Pretty as a Picture' are by T. B. Bishop, a musical broker, who has the satisfaction of knowing that over 100,000 copies of his songs have already been sold, and an equal number will be sold before they die out.

'Of John Howard Payne's wonderful air over two million copies must have been sold and the publishers will grow rich from the work of the singer who died away from the home he so passionately loved. To this same class of popular songs belongs Thomas Moore's 'Last Rose of Summer,' of which 1,500,000 copies sold in this country, and it has, therefore, a place among American songs. O 'Kathleen Mavourneen,' by F. N. Crouch, 500,000 copies have been sold, and it is still in much demand. Crouch s an Englishman, who has been in this country since 1848. 'Sweet By and By' is by J. P. Webster, and its sale will soon reach 500,000 copies. Then come Joe Emmet's 'Sweet Violets.' W. J. Scanlan's 'Peek-a-Boo' Frank Howard's 'When the Robins Nest Again,' and Ben William's 'A Boy's Best Friend is His Mother.' I could give no figures as to the sale of these songs, but they will all reach the half-million stage."

A writer in England says that the number of country houses where lawn tennis is played on Sunday afternoons is large and is growing larger. He tells of a house that could not be let last season because the owner wished to make it a condition of the lease that the tennis courts should not be used on Sundays. Even billiards are played on Sundays, he says, and almost everything except card games. But notwithstanding this relaxation of the rules of Sunday observance, it would be regarded as something unpardonable not to appear in a black coat on Sunday morning.

Rice Culture in the South.

A pound of the best rice in the New York market costs eight cents. It has a pearly, transparent grit, a beautiful polish and lustre; yet very few who use this very attractive article of food are aware of the labor and expense required to place it before them in this perfect state. As an article of food it is second alone to wheat, and is the grand natural cereal upon which at least four hundred millions, or nearly one-third of mankind, mainly subsist.

Almost incalculable areas of it are raised in India and China, the various varieties seeming endless. On the island of Ceylon alone no less than 161 varieties are known: but the finest is raised in the States of North and South Carolina and Georgia, where those vast expanses of low-lying swampy lands and heavy vegetable soils render its cultivation comparatively easy and profitable.

The great fields lying low along the river-banks are divided into sections, and trunks and canals carry the water to each one separately by smaller ditches, by which they are flooded whenever desired. The rice is frequently sown on the water, covered with soil, where it quickly germinates, covering the fields with a beautifully delicate green grassy carpet, which turns a lighter and yellower tinge as it ripens.

As most of the fields have been reclaimed from the river near which they lie, they are continually subject to sudden overflows, the utmost vigilance being required to guard against this enemy, which often in one night ruins the fruits of months of labor. Some of the larger plantations cover two and three hundred acres, and employ several hundred men, women, and children.

From 1720 to 1740 the export of rice from the Carolinas was 143,986 tons. For 1740 alone 90,000 barrels were shipped. At the outbreak of the war 1,000,000 acres were under cultivation in South Carolina alone. In 1860 the production was 187,162 032 pounds, but the war almost ruined this immense industry, and in 1870 the combined productions of the two Carolinas, Louisiana, and Georgia was reduced to 59,000,000 pounds. A steady improvement, however, toward the old-time prosperity is now seen by comparing the productions of latter years with that of 1866, when it had dwindled to the comparatively insignificant amount of 12,002,080 pounds.

Very few besides Chinese and negroes can be kept on the plantations as workers, and owing to the intensely trying nature of the climate in summer, with its accompanying marsh fevers, the question of labor supply is a very serious one to the planters; but while the old-fashioned method of cutting, sowing and transporting still prevails on most plantations, numerous labor-saving machines and improvements have been introduced with marked success in the various milling processes.

Many large mills are to be seen on the low shores of the Mississippi, in the vicinity of New Orleans, but those at Charleston and Savannah are perhaps the largest and most complete in their appointments. Many are lofty buildings of brick or iron, their many storeys crowded with the latest improved machinery for hulling, dusting, cleaning, burnishing, and packing the grain ready for shipment. Situated at the water's edge, their tall chimneys pouring forth heavy columns of smoke, their derricks lifting the rough grain from the decks of the river craft, while the elevators, with long-armed spouts, dip deep into and fill the great holds of sea-going steamers with milled grain, the clouds of drifting chaff dust, the whir of machinery, and hurrying of boats and tugs, all present a most charming picture, and unmistakably indicate the rapid revival of one of the most valuable of the Southern industries.

Will Power.

The secret of success in life lies, as all history proves, in the power of the human will. No man ever became a great leader of men whose will was not the controlling force by which he dominated over others. Men, indeed, have been distinguished in the world of letters, law, science, the pulpit, and in legislative halls, by varied gifts and attainments; but in no case has man forced a following except by the magnetic power of his will. In illustration of this fact we have only to note the names of Mahomet, Cæsar, Napoleon Bonaparte, Cromwell, William III., and on this side of the Atlantic, Washington, Jackson, Henry Clay, Stonewall Jackson, and President Lincoln. All of these were men of strong will, bending to their purpose all who came within their reach. It is no answer to this statement that these men met with strong opposition, and they did not, even in the end overcome all opposing forces. The point is that their wills held to their purpose their followers.

Lawyers' Wit.

"I am not only witty in myself," said Falstaff, "but the cause that wit is in other men." Not a few lawyers may properly apply the Fat Knight's remark to themselves. But usually lawyers' witticisms, like that traditional flower, "blush unseen," save to the habitues of the court house. One of the sharpest raps which meandreing prolixity ever received is forgotten by the writer who tells the anecdote:

Once upon a time, a Providence lawyer whose prolixity was prodigious, while airing his astronomical knowledge before a jury, said, in a drawling tone,—

"We are informed—gentlemen of the jury—that there are—planets so far distant from the earth—that though their light has been travelling—ever since the creation—it has not yet reached us!"

"Probably will, Brother C——," interrupted the unknown wit, "before you get through."

BLEACHER

Weighs but 6 pounds. Can be carried in a small valise. Illustration shows Machine in boiler. Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.

$1000.00 REWARD FOR ITS SUPERIOR.

Washing made light and easy. The clothes have that pure whiteness which no other mode of washing can produce. No rubbing required, no friction to injure the fabric. A 10 year old girl can do the washing as well as an older person.

To place it in every household THE PRICE HAS BEEN REDUCED to $2.50, and if not found satisfactory, money refunded. See what the "Canada Presbyterian," says about it—The Model Washer and Bleacher which Mr. C. W. Dennis offers to the public has many and valuable advantages. It is a time and labor saving machine, substantial and enduring, and is very cheap. From trial in the household we can testify to its excellence. Delivered to any express office in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Charges paid $3.00. Send for circulars

is one of the hits. Not that a carriage top is anything new, but the great want of something more perfect than the heavy, expensive, inconvenient tops in use, suggested the invention of the Conboy Adjustable Top, which has been altered and improved until it now stands without a rival. The styles and grades now manufactured are the most popular, and are varied enough to suit all tastes. Mr. Conboy is the Pioneer in this business. It has been his aim since the commencement to merit the patronage and confidence of the trade and the public, by producing durable and convenient, and at the same time, elegant and stylish tops, that could be sold at exceedingly low prices. That this end has been attained is abundantly proved by the thousands sold, and the numerous letters of approval received from the leading carriage builders throughout the country. Since moving to Toronto, Mr. Conboy is giving his whole attention to the improvement and manufacture of carriage tops, where his increased facilities, his practical knowledge, and his numerous patenteed improvements, give him great advantage over all competitors.

SAW MILL AND TIMBER LAND FOR SALE OR TO LET

In the Township of Artemesia, County of Grey, 4 miles from Flesherton Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The mill is situated at Little Falls, in a block of about 400 acres timber and, with other timber land surrounding. The building is substantially built on stone foundation. The machinery is all good and driven with great power by a 23 inch Leffell wheel, under 36 ft. head of water. There are one large circular saw for cutting logs, 2 small circulars for sawing lath and broom handles, 1 guage lathe for turning broom handles, etc., 1 shingle machine with jointer and packer complete. The water power is excellent, the stream being very regular. There are several other good mill sites on the proyerty. The land in valley is considered the best in the country. The place would make an excellent stock farm when the timber is taken off.

This offers a good opportunity for a practical, energetic man to go into this kind of business, as the place will be sold or let on liberal terms.

The bush is so convenient to the mill logs can be trucked in summer time. Immediate possession given.

There is blood on the face of the moon. War between France and China is said to inevitable, and Germany, it is alleged, will assist China. James G. Blaine is credited with a burning ambition to fight the world generally, and the Cincinnati Enquirer says Blaine is not the only American who wants to fight. It believes that the Democrats would be even more ready to adopt a vigorous foreign policy then the Republicans, and points to the fact that under Republican rule the American navy has become the laughing stock of the world. —News.

Poetry.

The Following we Re-Publish by Special Request:

If we accord an honored place
To benefactors of our race,
A noble record will be read
Of those who bravely went ahead
And led our forest armies on
From Plymouth Rock to Oregon.
Fighting their way through smoke and fire
And savage beasts and savage ire,
Changing the savage wilderness
To the fair homes we now possess.
We have assembled here to-day
A tribute of respect to pay
To those whom we may well address
As veterans of the wilderness.
To these our local pioneers
Whose patient toil in by-gone years
Wrought out from nature's stern array
These well tilled farms we see to-day
And that we may appreciate
The blessings of our present state.
Compare our present situation
With theirs in pioneer relation,
Compare the fields you're tilling now
With those your fathers' had to plow;
Your farming implements compare
With their old stile of farming ware.
Your roads o'er which you glide with ease
With theirs amongst the stumps and trees,
Compare your dwellings large and fine
With their rude cabins seven by nine,
Sometimes so small as to require
To cook before an out door fire;
Compare your tables now supplied
With luxuries from land and tide,
With theirs, in pioneering days
When the best meal that they could raise
At sundry times was Johnny cake
Mixed with cold water from the lake.
Think of men selling first grade wheat
Fitted for market all complete
Two weary days upon the road
For marketing a single load.
For forty cents per bushel paid,
And even that in store pay trade.
Think of men working half a day
To get ten cents with which to pay
The postage on a single letter,
Because they couldn't do any better,
What would you think to pay a ten,
And walk eight miles to get it then.
Now you have markets, shops and stores
And mail brought even to your doors;
These things we name in part to show
The obligations that we owe
To those who pioneered the way
For these advantages to-day,
And may their children ne're forget
Their obligations, or the debt
For where we owe a sacred claim,
And have not means to meet the same.
It helps somewhat to bring content
To make a fair acknowledgment
But this you can in part repay
By filial kindness every day
And by preserving in your turn
What they there worked so hard to earn
These noble farms the homesteads dear
On which they toiled for many a year
And leave a sacred trust to you
Transmit them to your children too.
The tree beneath whose sheltering shade
In early childhood you have played
Preserve it with especial care.
Because your father set it there.
The handiwork your mothers made
For household ornaments displayed,
Save it, preserve it to the last
A sacred relic of the past.
You see these aged pioneers
Are bending with the weight of years
These frosty locks so thin and gray
Were thinned by many a toil-spent day,
And nights of watchfulness and care
Have furrowed the brows that once were fair.
A few more tide-waves ebb and flow
Will bear them on where all must go.
They'll leave behind a monument
The record of a life well spent,
In these fair farms their hands have cleared
In buildings that their hands have reared,
In these green fruit trees everywhere
Planted and cultured by their care.
An when upon the burial plain
They rest; These records shall remain
In witness of their grand success
In battling with the wilderness.
Oh! make the evening of their days
Light with affection's filial rays
Steady their steps as they descend
On life's last grading to its end.
Doing as you'd have children do
When you are old and feeble too.
But will these ladies be content
Without one word of compliment?
Didn't these old mothers do their share
Of pioneer work everywhere.
Bearing with perfect resignation
Toil, sickness, hardship and privation,
In the rude wilderness to make,
A home for their dear childrens sake?
In all the toils and cares of life
A man's real helper is his wife.
And these old fathers would have died
Had not their wives stood by their side.
Now in these modern, social fights,
I take the side for woman's rights.
Although to-day I'll not declare
Entirely what I think they are.
I know St. Paul has strangely said
The man should always go ahead,
In other words should have his way
And that the woman should obey;
And further seemed the thought to carry
That 'twas not best for man to marry.
If Paul had been a pioneer
And had your forest lands to clear
After he'd tried it for a year,
Had had old fashioned ague shake him,
And billous fever overtake him,
With no one near to soothe his woes,
Or hold the camphor to his nose,
Do you suppose he would have said
It was not best for men to wed?
I cannot say, I do not know,
About their wives so long ago,
They may have been so worthless then
They were a nuisance to the men,
And he had reason in his head
No doubt for saying what he said.
But if St. Paul were here to-day,
To look upon this fine array
Of faithful and devoted wives
Could read the record of their lives
Could look upon these lovely girls
Their sparkling eyes and glossy curls,
He'd doubtless say,—I do declare
I must have been mistaken there;
And then acknowledge to his credit
He had dyspepsia when he said it.
For if there is a heaven below
Where purest draughts of nectar flow,
'Tis where two pure congenial hearts
Are wedded fast by cupids arts,
And beat in perfect unison,
Their hopes, their joys and sorrows one.
Yet it requires peculiar skill
To run the matrimonial mill
Smoothly and kindly year by year
And have no clashing in the gear.
To selfishness we all incline
We have too much of me and mine
Too much I want! too much I will!
To clog the matrimonial mill.
And discord, too, is sometim'es made,
About the stock each puts in trade,
The wife may bring a smaller sack
Of corn to mill upon her back.
Still if she does the best she can,
Call it our meal and be a man.
Allow no jealousy or strife
To sour the very meal of life,
Let all the products of the trade.
A sort of common stock be made,
And use it only as you should
In common for the mutual good;
Have no dividing wall or line,
Let all be ours, not mine and thine.
A man may say my boots, my plow,
But he had better say our cow.
To make a proper application,
I give you here an illustration;
A gentleman but newly wed,
One morning to his new wife said,
"I now propose my plans to vary,"
"And think I shall enlarge my dairy,"
"Our dairy, dear," the wife replied,
"Would sound much better to your bride."
"My dairy," said the man of cows,
"Our dairy," say, replied his spouse,
"My dairy," still the man persisted,
"Our dairy, sir," the wife insisted.
Her eyes were snapping sparks of fire,
She seized the broomsick raised it higher,
And on his luckless head and back
Blow followed blow; whack followed whack.
The man had heard old people say,
That he who runs from fight away
May live to fight another day.
And hoping thus to save his head
He quickly dove beneath the bed.
He saw at once the wife He'd got,
Was dressed for business on the spot;
Was even pleased to find that trait
So well eveloped in his mate,
And further saw it was not best
With such a spirit to contest,
And wisely thought it best to yield,
To her the well contested field;
Then cautiously put out his head
From neath the covering of the bed,
"What do you wont she fiercly cried?"
"I want our hat" the man replied.
That was enough, the fight was done
Thenceforth their interests were one;
They'd no more jarring, balks or hitches
'Twas our cows now, our boots, our pantaloons,
Let husbands learn our cows to say,
Before the broomstick comes in play.

CHAPTER V.—CONTINUED.

But, though thus partially relieved, Sir George had quite enough of sharp dread and growing anxiety to make the short drive through the brilliant freshness of the summer morning a never-to-be-forgotten and almost unendurable age.

"Oh, Heaven spare my child!" the fierce cry of his heart rose unchecked to his lips, as he jumped out at the station door, and put the question on which his very life seemed to hang to the sunburnt station-master, who came forward at once to greet him, all eager attention to the great man of the place.

Yes, certainly. Mr. De Walden had walked over from the Court and gone up by the 8:50 express. Oh, yes, he was quite sure!—had seen and spoken to Mr. De Walden, and thought he looked very pale and ill——

The station-master paused in his fluent explanation, struck by the though that, if Mr. De Walden had been pale, Sir George had grown absolutely ghastly. His eyes were dim and glazed, his hands hung nervously down, and his handsome upright old figure shook as with sudden palsy.

"You are ill, sir. Sit down; let me get you something. Simmons, fetch some brandy," the man cried anxiously; and for the moment Sir George had to yield to the strong compulsion of his physical weakness, and suffer himself to be supported like a child. But when he had gulped down the fiery spirit the porter brought from the refreshment-room, he pushed his supporter roughly aside, and, with only a muttered word of thanks, made his way to the dog-cart

With a dull overhanging sense of calamity, with a hot aching in his heart and a dazed agony in his brain, Sir George drove on and on until he reached his own lodge-gate—the pretty honeysuckle-grown cottage that had struck him yesterday as the very abode of picturesque tranquility—until the lodgekeeper's buxom, cherry-checked wife came out, not, as it seemed, to accord him her usual respectful curtsey, but to stay his progress.

"Don't go on, sir," she cried eagerly, and earnestly pressing her curly-headed baby, with a sort of passion, to her breast—"at least not yet—not until you know. Oh, poor dear old gentleman, how shall I tell you all?"

She paused, with a little sob; and Sir George noted her pale cheeks and sad brimming eyes with a sort of intolerant anger. The change in the ruddy smiling face did not surprise him, but it filled him with a savage resentment. He did not question the woman, and so make her hard task easier, as she half hoped he would; he tried to push blindly on, but she detained him still.

"Oh, not like that, my poor master!" she cried, forgetting all fear in her intense pity for the man on whose head calamity was about to fall in such a crushing fashion. "We all love our children alike, great gentlemen and poor folks like me, and there's news to break your heart up at the house. The little master——"

'What of him?" Sir George broke in hoarsely. "Woman do not madden me! What of my boy? Is he—found?"

The woman looked at him pitifully for a second, then cried, with a sudden rain of tears—

'Found? Yes, the little angel! My lady found him in the shrubbery, quite dead, sir—murdered they say!"

CHAPTER VI.

"The course of true love never did run smooth," quoted May Verner cheerfully, as she patted her sister's dusky and dishevelled locks, and did her best to make light of an unpleasant situation. "Come, Essie, crying one's eyes out don't do a bit of good, so dry your and help me to think what is to be done."

Essie raised her pretty head from her sister's lap, and looked into her sister's face with a miserable attempt at a grateful smile; but the effort was a failure. The small under lip quivered piteously, the blue eyes brimmed over, and the girl hid her face again with a little choking cry.

'Oh, it is cruel—cruel. And what has Frank done?"

"Nothing, child," said the elder sister serenely—"nothing, at least, but sent a most blundering ambassador on a most delicate embassy. Any one with the slightest knowledge of papa's character might have known that in such circumstances he would do precisely what he has done."

"But Sir George De Walden could know nothing of papa's character."

"And therefore Sir George De Walden should never have been allowed to interfere. No; it Frank had had one grain of common sense, he would have come straight back, told the whole deplorable story to you and me, and left us to break it gradually to papa; instead of which he sends the stiff-necked old uncle to make all manner of haughtily offensive concessions and awkward attempts at bribery."

"May!"

"Well, he did, my dear: there is no mistake about that! And I am quite sure papa made himself equally disagreeable; so they parted with a mutually bad impression. You know the temper papa came home in, and I have no doubt Sir George was quite as unpleasant when he arrived at De Walden Court—not that that matters, for I am sure any punishment he gets will serve Mr. Frank quite right."

"May!" Essie cried indignantly; and her eyes sparkled angrily through the tears, her cheeks flushed with her passionate protest. "You are as bad as—as all the rest. I thought you liked poor Frank; but you too speak against him; and just now—when ——"

"When you mean to give him up," May finished, with a mischievous smile; but, though she smiled, her eyes were full of tenderest sympathy, and the slender jewelled fingers touched the dark ruffled locks as gently as a mother's could have done. "Is that it, Essie? Do you mean to give Frank up?"

She lifted the pretty face, and awaited the answer with some little anxiety; but she was quite satisfied with it when it came.

"Never!" Essie said, in a low steadfast tone; and her look was as her voice. "Papa gave me to Frank, and he cannot take me back. We cannot defy him: we may have to wait a long time, or Frank may grow tired and give me up; but I shall never care for any one else. I will be Frank's wife or—or an old maid!"

If the words were childish, the spirit was womanly and true. May stooped to kiss her little sister, laughing that she might not cry, for she detested any display of sentiment.

"Bravo! Essie, I see you in my mind's eye, with two cats, a plethoric poodle, and a couple of parrots. A charming old scandalmonger you will make in a couple of decades, my dear."

Essie turned away and walked to the window, impatient of a levity that jarred on her own strained pain. The poor child had been cruelly roused from her dream of bliss, driven out from her fool's paradise relentlessly, and the world held for her to-day no possibility of happiness and hope. As she stood blankly staring out into the sunshine, she could still see her father's face, blanched with such anger as he had never before shown in her presence—could still hear the harsh strident tones in which he peremptorily forbade her to think of Frank De Walden again.

"He has deceived us both, whether wilfully or not, and must abide the consequences of such deceit," he said sternly. "I will smooth no sucking barrister's path with my money, and my daughter shall be no stepping stone to success; and so I told the pompous old ass who seemed to think even an offshoot of the De Waldens a to which we had hardly the right to aspire, and spoke of the paltry hundreds he proposed to settle on his nephew as though they were the revenues of a Rothschild or a Coutts."

Heartstruck and dazed with pain, shivering under her father's anger, and shocked at the coarseness of his speech, Essie would still have made some feeble loyal attempt to plead the cause of her love and champion her absent lover; but May checked her with an imploring look. The wiser and cooler girl saw how much ruffled vanity and wounded pride had to do with his unjust explosion, and knew that further argument would only exasperate her father beyond all bounds. So she interposed, directing his attention with delicate tact to Essie's snow-white face and dark dilating eyes.

"You are frightening her to death," she said, in a reproachful whisper; and Mr. Verner, who really idolised his younger daughter, followed the direction of her eyes with quick alarm, though he said with little perceptible softening of his gruff tones:—

"Girls always faint over such matters. I don't fancy it does them much harm. But take her away, May, and, when she has cried her eyes out, make the poor little fool understand that I will have my way in this."

And May had obeyed him, so far at least as the taking of her sister was concerned—anything else was an after-consideration; just then she had to soothe the girl's hysterical fears and prevent the speaking of imprudent words on either side.

Long after Essie had sobbed herself to sleep and regained her lost happiness in dreamland, Miss Verner sat alone in the great drawing-room, for her father had angrily betaken himself to his club, and would not return until late, pondering a thousand plans for setting the crooked things straight.

"They must be patient—that is all," she decided hopefully. "Papa can never resist Essie long, and he is very fond of Frank. Moreover, I must enlist Croxford on their side."

A little dimpling smile that was not due to maiden consciousness played round May's red lips as the last thought flashed through her busy brain. She was an affectionate and dutiful daughter; but she was too clever a girl not to have taken her father's mental and moral gauge pretty well by this time; and she knew that her own aristocratic suit or would be her sister's best ally.

So she dispatched an imperative little note to Lord Croxford, bidding him come to her early on the following day, and then, with a pleasant sense of duty fulfilled and every precaution taken, had retired to rest in a tolerably hopeful frame of mind.

She awoke in the morning with this hope unchecked, and it rose higher still when, at the breakfast table, her father not only asked with anxious solicitude after Essie, who did not appear, but spoke with something like toleration of the absent Frank, though his indignation against Sir George blazed as fiercely as ever.

"As though the arrogant old ruffian should no tbe ashamed to show his face after the dirty trick he played his nephew!" he said, chipping as fiercely at his egg as though it represented the head of the offending Baronet; and May bent her head over the tall coffee-pot to hide a little triumphant smile, as she answers demurely—

"It was certainly hard on poor Frank."

"Hard!" Mr. Verner echoed the word with a derisive sniff. "It was the most outrageous—the most disgraceful! And then to ask him down to the Court and coolly spring the mine upon him! If the lad had an ounce of spirit, he would never have broken bread under the old traitor's roof. He would have come straight back to me, and——"

"And you would have given him a different answer from that you gave his uncle?" May suggested audaciously.

Her father frowned, and pushed his cup away.

"I did not say that," he growled; "but at least he should have tried me. But I suppose it's the old story—pride and poverty always go together."

"'It is never too late to mend,'" May suggested, with nervous cheerfulness as she came forward to pin the flower in her father's coat, and looked coaxingly into her father's face. Things had gone almost too well with her as yet; the stern man had been almost too easily managed. She began to be afraid.

And simultaneously with the fear the first repulse came. Her father almost pushed her away, and his frown grew very terrible as he said between his teeth—

"It is too late, I tell you. Do not nurse, or let Essie nurse, any delusion of that kind. No daughter of mine shall marry into Sir George De Walden's family, as I think he understands."

He went out then with a very determined look; and May's eyes followed him rather blankly for a second or so. But she was not easily depressed; and, when she had recalled the concessions he had made in even so short a time, she could not believe that on this one vital point her father would be obdurate still.

"Wait till Croxford talks to him, till Essie grows a little pale and thin!" she cried, with a laugh; and the idea so amused her that she had been able to play with her sister's fears.

But when Essie turned away, with that blank look of misery on her white pathetic face, the elder girl's warm heart was touched; she threw one arm around the slim shoulders, and said in hearty comforting fashion—

"You foolish child! Do you think I would laugh at you, or say one word against dear old Frank, if I were not sure that all would soon be well? Of course I would be crying my eyes out for company's sake. But just for one day's misery I cannot spoil my looks. Besides, Croxford is coming this afternoon. Come, Essie; you cannot really think that papa will refuse you anything your heart is set upon!"

Essie looked up wistfully, shaking her dark head, but smiling through her tears. She had an intense admiration for her elder sister's courage and bright wit, an unquestioning reliance on her word; but here she had so much at stake that she hardly dared to hope.

"But Frank," she whispered sadly—"Frank must know all now. May, why does he not write?"

May Verner laughed, a sweet little silvery peal that was like a cordial draught to the pale and frightened Essie, and shook her sister in the immensity of her amused contempt.

"Write!" she echoed, lifting her fine hazel eyes in emphatic appeal to the ceiling. "A pretty sort of lover he would be to plead his cause on paper! He will come."

"Come!" Essie repeated vaguely; and the shy sweet pink tints stole back into the soft cheeks; the blue eyes lost their strained pathetic look.

"Of course he will, as fast as an express-train and a hansom cab can bring him! Oh, Essie, what a baby you are! You ought to have a nurse still—not a lover."

Essie answered her sister only with a grateful kiss. A great burden had been lifted from her heart, but it was still too full for words. She was so young; it was so natural to hope, to believe in her strong clever sister, to trust the father whose pet and plaything she had always been.

"Now, run out and play, child, for there is Croxford in the hall, and I must talk business with him," May said, in her good-natured peremptory tones.

And Essie was only too glad to obey her, only too thankful to escape into the grounds, where she might wander at peace through the winding shrubberies, under the shadow of the elms and chestnut-trees, or down the little path beside the sparkling river, and dream of all the happy hours that she and Frank had spent amid these familiar scenes.

An hour ago it would have been torture to look upon places so associated with the lover she had thought forever lost, and it was painful still, though May's words echoed cheeringly in her ears, and her heart throbbed high with hope. All might—nay, all must be well with them again; but the contrast between the solitary stroll and the last ramble she had taken with Frank, when, without a doubt or fear to hamper their imagination, they had boldly sketched out a future full of bliss, was inevitably present in her mind. Hope would have seemed an impertinent intruder when felicity seemed sure—and she clung to that hope with a tremulous passion now.

She seated herself upon the mossy bank, leaning her dark head against the stem of a tall tree, and giving herself up to memory and thought. She shed a few gentle tears from time to time; but, on the whole, she was not unhappy. She trusted her sister so implicitly, and May had been so sure that Frank would come.

And somehow the minutes and hours flitted by; she did not know how long the lovers had been tete a tete, how long she herself had been dreaming in the sunlight, when she was roused by the sound of a step on the crisp sun-dried moss, and the hurried utterance of her name. A shadow came between her and the sunshine; and, looking up, she saw—Frank De Walden.

"Essie!" It was all he said; but the one word was eloquent enough; the shining eager eyes said all the rest.

Essie did not even attempt to answer him—only rose to her feet with a little glad and grateful cry, ran straight into her lover's outstretched arms, and hid her happy face upon her lover's breast. And for a little space, while the birds twittered gayly in the thick-leaved trees above them, and the river rippled musically at their feet, the young people clung together and were utterly content.

Then Essie drew shyly back; but Frank still held her fast.

"So you did not give me up?" he asked, eyeing the sweet flushed face with jealous fondness.

Essie looked up with a sweet reproachful glance; but the reproach changed to anxiety, for Frank looked pale and haggard, and almost old, she thought; and her heart smote her as she gazed at him.

"You are not well, dear," she said, slipping her little hand within his arm and pressing it gently in her alarm; but he answered at once—

"Quite well, my darling. You and May have cured me, for May sent me to you."

"You were ill then?" she persisted.

"Ill of suspense and misery," he answered gaily. "Nay, I will confess to such prosaic ills as fatigue and hunger, for I did not sleep all night and came without my breakfast this morning."

"Then come in to luncheon now," cried May's bright voice behin them, "for Lord Croxford and I are tired of each other's company and are most decidedly hungry by now."

CHHPTER VII.

Dspite the uncertainty o their position and the cruel disappointment one of them had sustained, the four young people enjoyed a merry meal in a thoroughly unconventional fashion. Lord Croxford did not perhaps contribute very largely to the success of the entertainment, being a young man of few words; but he was thoroughly kind-hearted, and by no means a fool, and suited May much better than a more masterful nature would have done. Moreover, he admired his bright betrothed in such a whole-hearted fashion that he almost seemed to shine with a reflected lustre when seated by her side.

"Does he not look absurdly happy?" Essie whispered, glancing at the tall young fellow whose fair Saxon face was radiant with delight, and whose short-sighted blue eyes beamed through their gold-rimmed glasses with such proprietorial pride.

Frank followed the direction of her eyes and smiled; but the smile was soon followed by a sigh.

"He is so sure of May," he said, not bitterly, but with a painful thrill in the low tone—so low that it reached only Essie's sympathetic ear. As the best answer she could think of at the moment, she thrust her little warm, soft hand into his, and whispered shyly—

"Not more sure than you are of me."

How could Frank be miserable after that assurance—how continue to doubt and fear when Essie so evidently thought that all their trials were past? Common sense had but a poor chance in that atmosphere of youth and happiness, even though Lord Croxford, who for a young politician was considered particularly sound on all questions of political economy, and May, who prided herself on being practical above all things, presided on the occasion.

Presently, however, Frank vigorously shook off the enervating sense of contented well being that had replaced his late harassed pain, and roused himself for the work that lay before him.

"With Essie and May both on my side, I ought to win the battle," he said, his gray eyes brightening with the old hopeful look; "but the first thing now is to see Mr. Verner"

Essie grew a little pale, remembering her father's over-night declarations of what he would do and say, should young De Walden venture to intrude into his presence. She bit her lip nervously and shot one piteous glance at May; but her sister returned it with a confident smile.

"The sooner the better, Frank, and fortunately it can be very soon, for I see papa just entering the avenue."

Frank was anything but a coward; nevertheless his heart beat a little faster, and he twisted his moustache nervously, while Essie looking like a guilty little ghost, pressed closely to his side.

"Courage, my children," May cried gaily, her spirits seeming to rise with the occasion, though in truth she was as nervous as any one there. "Papa's bark is terrible, that I admit; but I do not think he ever really bites. Besides, we are four to one, all resolute and strong—ours should be an easy victory. Hark, he is at the door!"

"Tell him Frank is here, May—tell him, please; meet him in the hall, dear, and prepare him!" poor little Essie cried, with whitening lips, as her eager self-torturing fancy conjured up cruelly vivid scenes of dissension, in which her lover and her father played the principal parts.

May hesitated—not from any selfish fear—she would have undertaken the most difficult and unpleasant task possible to save her timid little sister an added pang; but she was by no means sure that it would be wise or politic for her to interfere just now.

"Shall I," she cried, with a rapid appeal to the waiting trio—"or shall Lord Croxford, or——"

"Or shall I myself?" Frank interrupted, with a rapidly rising color and proudly brightening eyes. "May, you are the kindest of girls; but I think, if I am ashamed to face Mr. Verner, I have no right in his house."

An emphatic and apparently involuntary "Hear, hear!", from Lord Croxford gave point and emphasis to the speech; and, with a frankly-spoken "I think you are quite right," May Verner drew back to let the young man pass, and crossed quickly over to Essie's side.

"Come, Essie." She threw her arm round the little trembling figure and smiled into the white frightened face. "It is just one wrench, like having a tooth out, you know, and then everything will be right. It is not Frank papa quarrels with—only Sir George; and you do not want to marry him."

But Essie did not smile; she was staring with an agonised intensity of gaze across the room at the door which opened just as her lover reached it, and showed he father on the other side.

For one second the two men stood face to face, so close that they could have touched one another; then Mr. Verner drew back a step or two, with a harsh and dreadful cry—

"You—and here? Heaven help us all!"

All eyes had naturally been turned upon the newcomer's face, all ears had been strained to catch the first words he should utter, and none doubted that these would be angry, even insulting perhaps; but there was no anger in the cry that rang out with such painful incongruity—rather a great horror and dread, that were emphasised by the haggard sharpened face and dazed-looking eyes.

"Mr. Verner," Frank cried, drawing up his tall figure, and speaking rapidly in an impulse of bewildered indignation, "I have no right here perhaps; but once you made me welcome; you gave me Essie, and—and she and I——"

The poor young fellow broke down with flushed face and eyes that sparkled uneasily for even he could no longer mistake the strained terror of that unwavering gaze for mere anger at his intrusion.

"Papa, what is it?" May cried quickly; and the tones of his daughter's clear vibrating voice seemed to rouse Mr. Verner. He came quickly into the room, closing the door carefully behind him; and, as he stood in the fuller light, they saw more clearly the deadly pallor of his ordinarily ruddy face. He had grown, May thought, older by ten years since the morning. It was to her and not to Frank, that his first words were spoken.

"Take Esther away," he said peremptorily; and, though his words were stern, it seemed to the girl that his voice thrilled with an intense pity.

Perhaps Essie thought so too, or perhaps love gave the timid girl courage, for she took her place by her lover's side, and, though her face grew red and white with painful rapidity, her pretty voice hardly faltered as she said—

"Please do not send me away, papa, because I could not go. Whatever you say to Frank you must say to me. I am just as bad as he, for I love him and I cannot give him up!"

Following the Doctor's Advice.

"Doctor, I want you to do something for me. My nerves are shattered completely. I am not able to eat anything and I sleep very little at night What would you advise me to do?"

"What has brought about this condition?"

"Drinking too much, I'm afraid."

"Well, I would advise you to give up drinking."

"H'm, that idea never occurred to me. What's your charge for the advice?"

"Nothing."

"Nothing! I am much obliged to you, doctor. Let's go and take something."

Salt Lake Dwellings.

The houses built by the first settlers were mainly log cabins. Some few of these are yet to be found hidden away in orchards. The Spanish adobe house of dried mud was also a favorite, and has continued so to the present, though instead of almost shapeless chunks of mud, plastered in Mexican fashion, regular unburned bricks are made by machinery. These adobes are twice the size of ordinary bricks, and the wall into which they are formed is made twice as thick as one of burned bricks would be. Of course this material lends itself readily to any style of architecture, and many of the elaborate buildings as well as cheap cottages are made of it, the soft gray tint of the adobe reminding one of the cream-colored walls of Milwaukee. Generally, however, the adobe is overlaid by a stucco, which is tinted. Low houses with abundant piazzas are the most common type in the older part of the town and over these so many vines will be trained and so much foliage cluster that one can hardly say of what material the structure itself is formed. The residences more recently built have a more Eastern and conventional aspect, and some are very imposing; but big or little, old or new, it is rare to find a home not ensconced—almost buried—in trees and shrubs and climing plants, while smooth, rich lawns greet the eye everywhere in town, in brilliant contrast to the bleak, bare hills towering overhead just without the city. As for flowers, no town East or West cultivates them more universally and assiduously.

Salt Lake City, then, is beautiful—a paradise in comparison with the buffalo plains or the stony gulches in which the great majority of Rocky Mountain towns must needs be set.

The suburbs, except toward the rocky uplands northward, grade off into farms quite imperceptibly, the streets continuing straight out into country roads between dense jungles of sunflowers—glorious walls of gold edged with green and touched with innumerable dots of maroon. And in these suburbs you may find some of the quaintest, most idyllic homes. One such, for example, stands down in the third ward. The house is hardly bigger than a good sized room, and is entered through a queer narrow cowled doorway. The second story is hardly half as large as the lower one, leaving a slanting roof between, and a picturesque hedge and fence inclose the whole. This would be striking enough alone for its shape; but every two weeks the whole adobe and stucco affair is whitewashed from roof-tree to foundation, until it gleams like a fresh snow-bank against the grape-vines that creep around its angles, and the poplars and maples that photograph their boughs in shadow upon its spotless sides. But to set it off the better, the owner paints his small window-sashes bright yellow, his casings the reddest of red, and his sills and shutters and door panels vivid green. If the whole affair had just been handed out of a Dutch toy shop, it could not be more fantastic and childishly pretty.—ERNEST INGERSOLL, in Harper's Magazine for August.

The Disappearance of "The Scold.'

Nothing was more common in the sixteenth century that a "scolding woman," and the scolding woman had not disappeared in this country till after Declaration of Independence—some even survived that. The evidence of this does not rest upon tradition. The literature and the laws are full of it. Laws had to be framed with severe penalties to protect men from the "common scold"; and these penalties were often inflicted, one of the most effective of them being the "ducking chair," which in many cases was the only one that could check the wagging of the virulent tongue. Nothing is commoner in the ballad literature of the sixteenth century than the complaints of the railing of the scold and the shrew, and the devices for taming them was as ingenious as they were brutal. Either the literature of the time is an awful libel, or scolding women were so numerous as to be a great feature of the age; scolding was as prominent as begging, and the scolding wife as common as the tipsy husband. The philosopher wants to know whether it is the temper of women which has changed, since it is a fact that the "common scold" has practically disappeared from modern life (there used to be women whom even the sheriff was afraid of), is no more a piece de resistance of literature, and has not to be legislated against, or whether the apparent difference is only a change in man's attitude toward the sex. Some students of sociology think that the man's submission has wrought the transformation, and that women appear to be more sweet and amiable now they have their way unruffled. It is a very delicate question, and one that would not be raised here except in the interest of science. For the disappearance of traits in human nature is as useful a study as the elimination of useful members or the development of new organs in our evolution. Nobody except the sociologist can say what the disappearance of the "common scold," has to do with man's position in the modern recreations of society; the business of this department is to collect facts, not to co-ordinate them.—CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER, in Harper's Magazine for August,

Throwing the Boomerang.

The boomerang used by the natives of Australia is a piece of thin wood about an inch and a half wide, an eighth of an inch thick, and perhaps twenty inches long; its shape varies, sometimes being like the segment of a circle, at others like a man's arm bent at the elbow, but the way of using both these forms is exactly the same.

The weapon is grasped at one end in the right hand, with the concave side uppermost, and the black man takes a run, such as the ordinary cricketer does when he is throwing a ball. On a sudden he stops, and away flies the boomerang, not straight, as one might suppose, but revolving on its own axis so quickly that in the air it looks like a circular piece of board; this motion gives it the wonderful power of flight, which must really be seen to be believed. At first the course is in a direct line from the thrower, and at such a height as he may require, but as it draws toward the limit of its distance it swerves slightly to the right, and making a semicircle, turns toward its owner, coming back on an exactly opposite course to that which it took on the outward journey, generally falling within a few feet of the thrower. During the flight the revolving of the boomerang causes a peculiar purring sound, not unlike the hum of a top.

FOR THE FARMER.

Kindness as an Investment.

There is nothing worse for domestic animals than to scare them half to death. Fright uses up the vital forces more than work, more than the growth of flesh or fat, more than anything else, unless it is persistent starvation.

We have had two men working for us, with teams, on the same farm at the same time. One would take his horses from the stable when they had been refreshed by a few days' rest, and were feeling well and because they were pretty frisky while they were being harnessed, and the off horse did not keep the furrow well at the first send-off would get out of patience and yell at his team till finally they would break into a trot, when he would throw the plow to the full depth into the first hummock he could find, bring the team to a full stop, and by this time they would be well in a "lather" and quivering with excitement. After he had yelled for a few minutes, and the horses had become fully frightened, they had used up enough strength to move the plough for an hour.

The other man knew better. When he observed while "hitching up," that the horses' heads were carried high, and that they were feeling first rate, he would say to himself: "There is a good head of steam on to-day, and I shall be able to get a good day's work out of these fellows if I save it all to be used to the best advantage." Therefore he would speak in as quiet a tone as possible, would move gently about, and aim to get his team afield without the risk of any rumpus or excitement, and would bear with a few irregularities, such as getting out of the furrow and pulling by fits and starts a few times. The consequence would be that when they were warmed up to their work, they would move on smoothly and at the same time quickly, and at the end of an hour these would be a row of nice fresh furrows to show as an equivalent for the "steam" the other man had used up in mere fret and fume and worry and passion.

As it is with larger animals, so it is true of fowl; if you at all times exercise kindness toward them, they will doubtly repay you for all your care and kind attention.

Budding Forest Trees.

The propagation of woody plants by the process known as budding, consists in taking from one tree or shrub, a bud, and transferring it to another. The plant upon which the bud is placed is called the stock. The limits of this operation are not very well defined, but for all practical purposes I may say that it is limited to the members of the same genus, or closely allied plants; that is, oaks may be budded on oaks, chestnut on chestnut, and generally the nearer related the species, the more successful the operation. But, like all other rules pertaining to the propagation of plants, there are exceptions, and occasionally we may find that the wood of two species, belonging to the same genus, cannot be made to unite and form what is termed a union.

There is always a preference in stocks belonging to the same genus, and the propagator seeks the best for his purpose. I may say, however, that, as a rule, the weak and feeble growing should always be placed upon the strong growing, if rapid growth and long life is the object in view.

Budding is usually performed in summer, soon after the buds, or a portion of them, are fully developed on the young wood of the present season's growth. The stock into which the buds are to be inserted, must be in a similar condition, although the stem or branch at the point of junction may be more than one year old, but in no case must the bark be so thick and rigid, that it cannot be readily separated from the wood beneath, because the bud is to be inserted under the bark of the stock, and unless this can be done, the operation will fail.

We have to depend upon the assimilated nature sap, to form a union between the bud and the stock, the same as we do on layers and cuttings to produce roots, for all the operations are analogous, only in budding, the albumous matter forms a union with the same material in the stock, while in the layer and cutting, it is emitted in the form of roots.

The proper time for budding trees, must, of course, vary with the latitude, season, and kind of trees to be propagated, as some come forward earlier than others, but as a rule, it may be performed as early in the season as good plump buds can be found at the axils of the leaves in shoots of the present season's growth. The upper and immature ones, can of course, be discarded, if it is necessary to commence budding before all are in fit condition to use.

Killing Weeds.

The New England Farmer says:—If farmers could be only made to realize the economy of a thorough pulverization of the soil before planting or sowing their seeds, we should soon find a very marked improvement in the appearance of the cultivated fields in the country, for wherever we go we find a great deal of very poor, and very coarse farm work. Many farmers seem to make as hard work of taking care of a field of corn, potatoes, or other annual crop, and do their work as "back handed" as a carpenter would who should undertake to build a house, or make a nice piece of furniture out of undressed lumber, and the attempt to smooth it up and polish it off after the parts are all put together.

The best market gardeners have learned that the highest success in the cultivation of their crops can only be attained upon land that has been most thoroughly prepared, not only by high manuring, but by repeated ploughing and harrowing, and with implements suited to the work. Coarse turfs, stones, or hard lumps of loam or clay are not allowable in any good market garden, and they should not be in ordinary farm fields. Nor is there half the necessity for rough, coarse, farm work that one might infer from the too common practices of the average American farmer. It is not necessary to grow a half crop instead of a full crop. Neither is there any need of having one half the product of our lands returned to us in the shape of worthless weeds. It costs no more to grow a pound of wheat or corn than to grow a pound of weed seeds, and it costs no more to keep a field clear of weeds than to keep it half clear, provided one takes hold of the work at the right end, and at the right time. Indeed, good work on the farm saves labor rather than wastes it, just as good work in any other industry proves economical in the long run.

No one need travel far in the country at this time of the year, to find planted fields that were so rough and coarsely worked during the early part of the season, as to require a great deal of patience, as well as hard work, in their cultivation during the growing period of the crop. All the work of the present season is to have been done poorly, and far too much left for the future. The ploughing having been but half done, the harrow failed to do its part of the work of pulverisation. The surface being left rough and uneven, the rows could not be planted straight, nor could the seeds be covered at an even depth, nor upon a uniformly level surface. The rows being crooked, and the hills coming at various heights, the work of the harrow or cultivator must be far from complete.

We have seen, in one instance, a farmer going four times through each row in his corn field with his cultivator, before he could get the soil in any kind of condition for the hand hoe. In other instances, a less amount of team work has left the field so thoroughly tilled that little or no hand labor was required. Good farmers are learning that more than half the effort usually expended in tending a hoed crop might be saved by a proper previous preparation of the soil. To do this, we should first plough thoroughly. If the field is sod land, the sod should be turned completely over, and in furrows of uniform width and depth, and the depth should be sufficient to allow of making a mellow seed bed upon the inverted furrows without turning back any of the sod. If the plough runs eight inches deep in some places, and only two or three inches deep in other places, or if the furrows are partly turned and left upon their edges, this mellow seed bed without turf or sods, will be impossible to obtain, and the subsequent work of tending a crop will be expensive and annoying.

The time has come when the cultivation of the soil here in New England, and in all the older States, must be done by the most economical methods possible, that our labor may be fairly remunerative. We can no longer afford to spend our time killing weeds chiefly by hand labor, or by the use of crude, ineffective instruments. We must get our grounds in such condition by good ploughing and good harrowing before the crops are put in, that the later work will be comparatively easy and inexpensive.

Out-Door Amusements.

Julian Ralph, writing of out-door sports for young ladies and the influences exerted by these sports, expresses her belief that the new taste is on the whole beneficial to the sex. Of Brooklyn and its amusements she says: The older girls, young ladies of marriageable age, were playing lawn tennis, and playing it with young men, and with a vigor that required the agility of gymnasts; When they leaped they sprang clear off the ground and landed as lightly as birds; when they ran it was with a free and graceful movement. When they struck at a ball it was with a blow that gave assurance of quick judgment, strong muscles, and trained sight. Near by, I saw three girls of fifteen or sixteen practising a running jump. Further on were some other tennis players, who in an intermission had started a game of tag. Do you remember how the average girl used to play tag a few years ago? She would run screaming at the top of her voice with a mincing step from under absurd entangling skirts; until her short breath gave way, and then on being touched by her equally hysterical companion, would sink breathless on a seat or upon the grass. That is not how these young women did it. Their dresses somehow produced the effect of swiftness, and they bounded lightly over the turf with palms closed and held at the breast, with lips shut, and with eeys aflame with fun. They doubled, danced tantalizingly before the one who was "it," dodged like wrestlers, and shot away like deer, and never did one of them utter a scream.

In a fashionable ladies' gymnasium in a Canadian city I saw some girls on a trapeze, on horizontal bars, with fling rings, and with rowing and lifting machines, and when I suggested that the introduction of a punching bag such as pugilists use to develop their muscles and chests, limber their backs, and promote quickness of motion would be a good thing to add to the paraphernalia there, the proposition was favorably received. The new movement is a grand one. Women can no longer lounge at home and read novels or confine their accomplishments to the three R's, the piano, and the waltz step It is not in keeping with the spirit of their age. The true women's rights movement is under way, and is leaving the foolish platform reformers far behind. Women are devoting their lives to the arts and sciences, to trade and the professions. They must get strength and robust health in order to enjoy confidence in themselves and fertility in resources. Exercise has no unsexing influence. The athletic girls of my acquaintance are all the more girlish or womanly, as the case may be, in consequence of their better development. It will be well when we can say "farewell" to the last of the dolls and "all hail" to the new race of active and confident women.

Burial on the Bank of the Congo.

The body of the dead man has been previously smoked and dried over a slow fire, so that the flesh, except upon the hands, shrunk and reduced to a leathery covering round the gaunt bones. The face had been gaudily painted with scarlet, yellow and white pigments, and the whole body was encrusted with the red dye of the camwood tree. Round the nose and mouth was wrapped a band of cloth and gay patterned cottons swathed the body. For some reason the hands were quite plump and well covered with flesh, as if in life. The dead man had been placed in his grave in a sitting posture, many layers of native cloth lying under him, and ready to cover him up on the top were piles of cotton stuffs received in trade from the far off coast, and representing to these natives a considerable amount of wealth. In the vague, half-determined notions which the people here have conceived as to a future existence, everything in the spirit world is supposed to be a pale copy of things existing on the earth, so that for this reason they put cloth, vessels of pottery and, in the case of a chief, dead slaves into the grave, in order that the deceased, on arriving in the land of shades, may not appear unprovided with the necessary means of making a fresh start in a new life. The grave in which this man had been buried had been dug in a hut, and the head of the corpse was not more than two feet below the surface.

LOST CHARLEY ROSS.

The Tragedy of the Hearth and the Broken Hearts Around It.

I stood for a long time before a picture recently, the life-size portrait of a lovely, laughing child. The face was that of a boy of four years, fair and dimpled, with a little rosy mouth, just made for kissing, large, clear brown eyes, through which a happy little soul shone brightly, and soft, flaxen curls shading a broad, white brow, and falling about a round, white neck

"That is Charley, my little Charley," said the master of the house sadly, and looking from his careworn, nervous face to the cherub vision on the wall, for the first time an understanding of the tragedy of Charley Ross dawned upon me, and for the benefit of the new generation and those to whom the tiny hero of a mournful tale has been but a newspaper myth, I am going to take up the freshest threads of a well-worn story, as related to me by Mr. Ross in view of the green lane where his little son was stolen from him.

The house itself is situated at the end of a broad and beautiful thoroughfare in Germantown, called East Washington lane. On both sides of it are handsome, substantial mansions of grey granite, such as Pennsylvanians love, and built far back from the road in the midst of spreading lawns, shaded by fine trees and sprinkled with beds of gay flowers. More peaceful and beautiful surroundings one could hardly find, and a miniature farm of a few acres now dotted with sweet-smelling haycocks next to Mr. Ross's place even suggested the country.

The house of Mr. Ross is a spacious double one, built of stone, and surmounted by a cupola. It stands on the summit of a great slope, and, with its broad piazzas covered with climbing honeysuckles and roses, its huge baskets of plants and ferns, and its friendly elms and oaks, looks a secure and pleasant retreat from the noise and turmoil, the dust and confusion of the world.

Sitting on the front verandah, I remarked how thoroughly the great hedge of fir trees at the foot of the lawn cut off the view of the street,

"Yes," said Mr. Ross, "too thoroughly, for it helped the wretches who stole my children to escape with them. Ten years ago the first of July," he continued, "my little Charley, just four years old, and still in petticoats, was playing in the road with his brother Walter, two years older than himself. While they were frolicking about two men came along in a waggon drawn by one horse. It seems they had and given them candy. That day they invited the boys to get in for a little ride, promising them firecrackers and candy. They, fearing nothing, complied, and were seen as we found later, by some of the neighbors.

"When I got home at six o'clock to tea, Mrs. Ross and my eldest daughter being at Atlantic City for their health, the children had not returned. The neighborhood was scoured in vain, and at 8 o'clock, on my way to the Central Office to telegraph the police stations, we met Walter returning home with Mr. Peacock, a friend of the family, who had found him crying bitterly on a street corner in the northern part of Philadelphia, just seven miles from home.

"The boy was nearly paralyzed with fright, but managed to relate how these men promised to take them to 'Aunt Susie"s to buy sweets and firecrackers; that they had lifted him out of the waggon and sent him into a shop to get them, and when he came out they had disappeared with Charlie. The police thought that the men were on a drunken frolic, and when sobered would be alarmed at what they had done, and turn Charley adrift.

"The theory proved false. On the 3d of July we advertised for him with a reward, and the next day we received an anonymous letter in disguised writing, the first of a series of twenty-three, which said the child was safe, but that no living power could discover him, and his father would have to pay 'a big cent' to get him back. The next letter demanded a ransom of $20,000, from which sum the kidnappers never abated a jot, with the alternative of putting the child to death."

It is impossible in a letter to describe the methods used for the recovery of the child and the capture of his jailers, who demanded that the money should be paid in advance of the return of the boy. While negotiations were pending 70,000 photographs of little Charley were distributed throughout the land, and tons of posters, handbills and lithographs sown broadcast. The citizens of Philadelphia offered for the kidnappers, of which reward the police volunteered to claim no part, and other large sums were offered from public and private sources, while the pressure put on Mr. Ross not to jeopardize the safety of every child in the land by paying the ransom was tremendous.

The police force and detective bureaus of the whole country engaged in the search, and in Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey every river boat and sloop, every outhouse, stable, and place of ill-repute, every hotel and lodging house, tramp quarter, burglar's haunt, barn, mill, ferry, and deserted hut, was searched, and every building, private and public, in Philadelphia, gone through. The Post Office and all the letter boxes were watched; detectives watched every train that left or entered the city. Human ingenuity wore itself threadbare in attempts to recover the stolen boy.

Fraud, too found a festival in this new form of domestic calamity, and Mr. Ross received thousands of letters from spiritualists, clairvoyants, and mediums, and even from blackmailers of all sorts, including convicts in jail, and murderers awaiting their doom, professing knowledge of the abductors

Then came a host of these vile creations called anonymous letters, always the work, as Superintendent Walling says, "of creatures who have all the willingness but not the courage to commit murder." These letters were to the police, suggesting that Mr. Ross stole his own child; that if his fine garden were dug up its bones would be discovered; that the child was not Mrs. Ross's, etc. One newspaper boldly printed an article embodying these suggestions, was sued for libel, severely reprimanded by the Court and obliged to pay heavy damages.

The uproar the country was in over this case, and the way man, woman, and child turned detective, thoroughly alarmed the kidnappers, and they deserted plan after plan proposed to Mr. Ross for the exchange, so afraid were they of being entrapped. In the history of civilisation there has never been a crime like this, worse than as thoroughly baffled detectives.

One plan proposed by the abductors, and which involved almost fatal consequences to Mr. Ross, was that he should put the money in a valise, start from Philadelphia at night, go on to New York and thence to Albany, riding the entire distance on the platform of the rear car, and the instant he waving a handkerchief he was to throw the valise on the track, with the warning that if the train was stopped the child's throat would be cut.

Mr Ross went through this trying ordeal standing on his feet the entire distance, every nerve on the intense strain with the fear of missing the signal, which was looked for in vain. His own description of this heart-rending journey is thrilling, but coming after months of mental agony and overfatigue, it terminated in a severe illness which decided his wife and family to run the risk of paying the ransom in advance on the faint hope that the boy would be returned; but though all their directions were followed, the child-thieves, on whose track the police now were, failed to appear and a lull ensued for several weeks.

Then the public were electrified at hearing that two burglars had been killed while roobing a house on Bay Ridge; that one, Mosher, died instantly, and that his comrade, Douglass, lived only long enough to confess the stealing of Charley Ross, and to solemnly swear that no one but the dead man knew his whereabouts, and so it is today that the fate of that little sunny-faced, golden-haired boy is still wrapped in a deep mystery.

The safety of millions of children has been purchased, it seems too sadly true, by the life of one, though the parents of that one still fondly cling to the hope that their son will come day appear among them.

"The hue and cry that rang through this great republic," said Mr. Ross, "strangled this species of crime in its birth. No one dreamed before what a hold a child of four years had on the heart of a nation, and though at the time my child was stolen there was no law by which his kidnappers could be punished, this and a number of other states have since then made the crime of child stealing for the purpose of extortion, punishable by twenty-five years of solitary imprisonment, with hard labor, and a fine of $15,000.

"I have," continued Mr. Ross, "examined personally into over seven hundred cases of boys supposed to be my son since his disappearance; have travelled thousands of miles in pursuit of him, and spent over $60,000 in trying to trace him in vain. In the first two years alone over three hundred children, scattered from Maine to San Francisco, and even in England Scotland, Cuba, Nova Scotia, and Canada, were supposed to be my child from the resemblance to his pictures or the mystery surrounding them. I have often thought of the extraordinary number, if girls are included, of children about whose existence and surroundings there is something suspicious."

"Has this hunt for Charlie ever resulted in the return of any lost children to their parents?"

"Yes, of a number; for though mine was the first case on which a ransom had been put, other children have been to beg for them, and even in some cases taken for personal revenge. The most pitiful case I know of was that of little Henry Lachmuller of St. Louis, who was stolen from his father's garden by two tramps, who had a woman with them, and wanted a child to beg. Mr. Lachmuller offered large rewards, and employed every means to recover his child, travelling all over Europe, and several times in this country, advertising his loss, but in vain.

"Well, one day I received a letter from Chester, Ill., describing the tramps who had been brutal in their treatment of a child supposed to be Charley, and to disguise him had thrown acids in his face, dyed his hair, and scarred his poor little body. My brother James went on at once, and saw that it was not our lost lamb; but the publicity given the case by the papers reached Mr. Lachmuller, and on the bare supposition of its being his son, he came on and found, indeed, that it was his child.

"Strangely enough, though the villainous treatment he had been subjected to had made the boy forget even his name and the place where he came from, he recognized his father with a scream of joy. There has also been another class of cases in which, though the proper parents could not be found, the children have been taken away from the wretches who had them in charge and been properly taken care of by the authorities."

"How do you account for this large number of stray children?"

"A great many of them never can be accounted for. Some have left asylums or homes; many are illegitimate, and quite a number belong to families in which has prompted either the father or mother to take them away and keep them in concealment. There are also instances where the children have been purposely put on trains and deserted, or where they have run away from guardians glad to get rid of them. Children are not unfrequently found among Italian or gipsy bands who cannot be accounted for.

"Yes," continued Mr. Ross, in reply to a question, "dozens of children have looked me in the face and said their name was Charley Ross. In fact, that name has become the synonyme of a lost child, and it is frequently given to children in poorhouses and asylums. Hardly a week passes without a letter or a clue of some sort being sent to me now, and, of course the claimants are frequent. Why, a fortnight ago, a little tramp calling himself Charley Ross, looked me right in the eye and said he remembered my singing him to sleep with Moody and Sankey's hymns. I never sang a tune in my life."

"Do you believe your son is living now?"

"I do not know what to believe any more than you do; but until I know he is dead his mother and I shall watch for his coming," concluded Mr. Ross with emotion.

Six other lovely children played about the Ross homestead one of them a fairy girl bearing a striking likeness to her lost brother, but as I walked back through the shady lanes to the station I was struck by the fact that though ten summers had fled since the cruel robbery, not a child could be seen frolicking on the highways.

Geraniums and calceolarias, used in "window gardening," are said to exert a powerful influence in keeping a room free of flies.

A Sword of Honor Presented to a Woman.

Mlle. Lix is now 45 years old. She is the daughter of an officer in the French Army, and was born at Colmar. Her mother died when she was a baby, and her father raised her as a boy, and made her wear boy's clothes until she was 8 years old. At 12 she could ride and fence admirably. At 17 she was well educated and spoke English and German. She went to Poland as governess to the daughter of a Polish countess. In 1863, when the rebellion broke out in Poland, she put on male attire, and joined the rebels. For bravery on the field she was made a Lieutenant. She returned to France in 1866, and when the cholera broke out in the north she distinguished herself as a fearless nurse and helper of the sick poor. In recognition of this service the French Government appointed her Postmistress of Lumarche, in the Vosges.

When the Franco German war broke out Mlle. Lix again put on her soldier clothes, enlisted in a free corps and soon afterward again became a Lieutenant and took part in the fight at Bourgonce-Nompatelize. She was called Lieute. Tony, the name given to her by the Polish patriots. She proved herself a brave fighter as well as a kind-hearted woman, and her labors for the relief of the wounded were indefatigable. When her company became part of the army of Garibaldi she devoted herself exclusively to the ambulances. At the close of the war she resumed her duties as Postmistress, but soon began to suffer with rheumatism, which she had contracted during the campaign, the hardships of which proved too much for her. She resigned; and the Government then gave her charge of a tobacco bureau at Bordeaux. She moves about on crutches. Her soldiery conduct won for her many honors. In '72 the Government conferred upon her a gold medal of the first class, as well as the bronze cross of the ambulances. Gen. Charcette in '73 sent her the medal of the Pontifical Zouaves, while the ladies of Alsace presented her with a splendid sword of honor; and this year the Chief Secretary of the National Society for the Encouragement of Good Conduct, M. Honore Arnoul, also sent her a medal of honor. Gen. Faidherbe, the Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honor, is about to present her with the cross of the Legion.

Two other French women, Mlle. Dodu and Mme. Jarretout, have also been decorated for bravery during the war of 1870 71.

Picking up the Cable.

The laying of the telegraph cables is now so common that the description of the machinery for picking up a broken one will be read with interest. It consists of a rope about an inch and a quarter in diameter, made from the strongest hemp, with interwoven wires of fine steel. The grapnel at the end is merely a solid shaft of iron some two feet long, and weighing about one hundred pounds, and prolonged into six blunt hooks, which much resemble the partly closed fingers of the human hand. In picking up the cable in deep water, the Minia, after reaching the waters near the break, lets out her rope and grapnel, then takes a course at right angles to the cable, and at some distance from the fracture, so that the broken ends may not slip through the grapnel. The grapnel rope is attached to a dynamometer, which exactly measures the strain of the rope, and shows unerringly when the cable has been caught. If the grapnel foals a rock the strain rises very suddenly to a high point; but the exact weight of the cable being known, the dynamometer signals by the steady rate of increase its hold on the cable far below. The ease and certainty with which cables are picked up in these days is amazing. A while ago one of the lines of the Anglo-American Company was caught without trouble at a depth of two and a quarter miles in the middle of the Atlantic. Capt. Tott, of the Minia who has won great fame for his skill and ingenuity in cable matters, but recently picked up the French cable 180 miles off St. Pierre, and in four hours from the time the grapnel was let go had the cable spliced and in working condition. The splicing is a work of great delicacy and skill, and when accomplished by trained fingers the spliced part can scarcely be distinguished from the main cord. So rapid has been the improvement in perfecting the modern cable that the resistance to the electric current has been reduced to one-quarter what it was twenty years ago, while the duplex system of sending and receiving messages doubles the capacity of every new cable laid.

Fortunes in Dogs.

Among the $350,000 worth of dogs exhibited at the New York show, were some worthy of note. Two were $10,000 dogs. One is a deer-hound and the other pointer. Of course no one would pay $10,000 for either, but that's the value placed on each by their respective owners. There are several dogs supposed to be worth from $2,000 to $5,000. The $10,000 pointer (Meteor) took the prize for dogs of that breed. His competitor was an English dog (Beaufort), and the international rivalry over the two was almost as strong as at the walking match. The large English contingent present maintained that the English dog should get the prize, and the Americans held that the American dog was entitled to it Many bets were made as to which would get it, and when the judge decided in favor of the American dog, about $5,000 changed hands.

Home.

You are to be pitied if you cannot find your first and greatest happiness at home. There is where you should find it. The independence that comes to a man when his day's work is over and he feels that he has run out of the storm into the quiet harbor of home, where he can rest in peace with his family, is something real. It does not make so much difference whether you own the house or whether you have one little room in that house; you can make that room a true home to you. You can people it with such sweet fancies that it will be fairly luminous with your presence, and it will be to you the very perfection of a home. Against this home none should ever transgress. It should be the place to find true love and courtesy.

The future of our country depends upon the youth of the land. While education, then in the usual sense of the word, should be highly valued, at the same time our people should not forget the most important education of home influence, and home discipline.

The Standard.

MARKDALE JULY. 24, 1884.

Live for Something.

Thousands of men breathe, move and live, pass off the stage of life and are heard of no more. Why? They did not a particle of good in the world, and none were blessed by them; none would point to them as the instruments of their redemption; not a line they wrote, not a word they spoke could be recalled, and so they perished—their light went out in darkness, and they were not remembered more than the insects of yesterday. Will you thus live and die? Live for something. Do good, and leave behind you a monument of virtue that the storm of time can never destroy. Write your names by kindness, love and mercy on the hearts of the thousands you come in contact with year by year, and you will never be forgotten. No, your name, your deeds, will be as legible on the hearts of those you leave behind as the stars on the brow of the evening. Good deeds will shine as bright on the earth as the stars of heaven.

EAST GREY PRIZE LIST.

The Editor of the Advance evidently feels sore over losing the printing of the above list for 1884, and communicates his feelings to the public through the colums of his paper. He first informs the public that we made several gross typographical errors, and finishes up by stating that "The pamphlets were printed at the Markdale STANDARD office, in the south riding of Grey. The first we flatly deny; two slight errors were in the copy, and he well knows that a printer is supposed to follow copy, which we did. and in the second place. though the STANDARD office is in South Grey (being a few rods over the boundery line,) we hold that our claims are equal if not greater than that of the Advance for tne above work, inasmuch as we are both a member of above Society and a ratepayer in the East riding, neither of which the Advance can claim.

The Annexation Bubble.

To the Editor of the Standard.

In your last issue appeared an announcement that a monster meeting is to be held at Niagara Falls on August 5, to arrange for the Annexation of the Dominion to Yankeedom. Past experience should give all Yankees a personal terror of setting foot upon the historic grounds near to Niagara Falls; but if they come as visitors to the soil that was well drenched with the blood of their cowardly ancestors, we will give them a safe permit. No doubt the trees that held the depraved skeletons of the lives of the present Annexation movers along the banks of the Niagara River, may have a charm for their vulgar fancy; or, perhaps, they would relish the job of cutting down the trees that formed a swinging, aerial tomb, to many of their dastardly ancestors, who were hurled over the Heights on the point of the bayonets of our noble Canadian Militia. Let them appoint the 13th of September as the day of assemblage, and make a pilgrimage to the graves of their wanton forefathers. Those who escaped that day, the writer has reason to believe, are running yet.

Annexation! everything to lose, and nothing to gain!! The spectacle to the world's gaze of the Dominion of Canada pinned as ballast to the tail of the Yankee kite!!! Avast! avast!! such thoughts clog me.

A worthy countryman of my own, upon his first visit to Niagara Falls, was asked by an inquisitive Yankee tourist if he did not wonder at the tremendous waterfall. "No! begorra; "but it wud be a wondher to me to "see it leapin' up hill." The Annexation movement has about the same chance of success. L. M. L. S.

VILLAGE IMPROVEMENTS. — Several new sidewalks have been added, and the old ones are at the present undergoing repairs, which adds much to the comfort and safety of the pedestrians.

The hardware department in M. Richardson's new block is now almost completed, and we presume will soon be fit to move into. It will be one of the neatest and most complete hardware stores in this section of the country. The finishing of the main part of the building, which is for the general store, is being rapidly pushed forward.

The contractors on Dr. Christoe's new building, Brooks & Willis, whom we understand has been delayed for want of brick, have now their wants supplied, and are rapidly pushing to completion the brick work of the same.

An interesting convention of Temperance workers and those interested in the cause of Temperance was held in the Town Hall last Friday afternoon for the purpose of organizing and considering the advisability of submitting the Scott Act in the County of Grey. A good representation were present and were unanimously in favor of submitting the Act. Also a meeting of those in favor of Temperance was held in the Methodist Church on Monday evening for the purpose of organizing in this township and fully entering upon the campaign.

It is a mark of generous nature always to hail with pleasure any token of reformation in our fellow men however low they may have fallen into sin and folley when a man publicly acknowledges his faults and as publicly avows his purpose to lead a new life and in his "future course" to be a better and a wiser man, such candid avowal deserves the sympathy and help of every right thinking mind. We are led to these reflections on reading the editorial in last week's Advance in which the editor of that paper acknowledging that he has been into very dirty work; mourns over his past course, and publicly announces that he will never again decend to "such depths" as he has done in the past; but will try to be a gentleman in future. We have some idea of what an amount of effort this will cost him, what constant discipline and watchfulness; the habits of a lifetime backed by the inbred tendencies of our nature are not easily overcome and replaced with an entirely new character. We are sure the readers of the Advance, who have so often been pained by reading the lucubrations of the editor when he decended to those "depths" he alludes to, will be delighted with his new resolutions, and devoutly pray that he may have strength to keep them.

Priceville.

Rev. E. C. Edmunds, B.D., Methodist Minister, who has labored in this place for the term of three years, has been appointed to the Wiarton circuit, whither he has removed with his family. They carry with them the good will and kindly wishes of numerous friends in this locality.

FIRE.—There seems to be an agent of the "Fire Fiend" in this locality. for it is scarcely a month since the workshops of Watson & Sons' were destroyed through his labors, when the alarming cry of Fire! Fire! Fire! awakened the inhabitants of the village at about 1 o'clock Monday morning, 14th inst. It was found that the cooper shop, occupied by James Tryon, was in a sheet of flame. The fire had made such headway before assistance arrived, that it was useless to try to save the building, and indeed had it not been for the earnest efforts of willing hands, the greater portion of the village would have been destroyed, for the wind was blowing directly towards the business portion, and burning cinders were fairly raining down. Fortunately no further damage was done. Mr. Tryon's loss is nearly covered by insurance.

The new Methodist Minister, Rev. Andrew J. Parker, has arrived here. They were welcomed to the Parsonage by a number of the friends and adherents of the church, on Thursday evening, 10th inst. Mr. Parker seems an earnest Christian worker, and it is hoped that his efforts for the elevation of society and the promotion of the cause of Christ may be heartily seconded by the church members on this circuit.

MONTHLY FAIR.—The regular monthly fair was held on Monday, 14th inst. It was largely attended, and a great number of cattle offered for sale. There were not so many buyers present, however, as there usually are, and very little stock changed hands.

Voters' List for 1884.

Municipality of the Township of Holland, County of Grey.

NOTICE is hereby given, that I have transmitted or delivered to the persons mentioned in the third and fourth sections of "The Voters' List Act," the copies required by said section to be transmitted or delivered of the list made, pursuant to said act, of all persons appearing by the last revised Assessment Roll of the said Municipality to be entitled to vote in the said Municipality at Elections for members of the Legislative Assembly, and at Municipal Elections; and said list was first posted up at my office at Williamsford Station post-office, Township of Holland, on the 17th day of July, 1884. and remains there for inspection.

Electors are called upon to examine the said list, and, if any omissions or any other errors are found therein, to take immediate proceedings to have the said errors corrected according to law.

CARSON PRICE,
Clerk of the said Municipality.
Dated the 17th day of July, A.D. 1884.

Voters' List for 1884.

Municipality of the Township of Osprey, County of Grey.

NOTICE is hereby given, that I have transmitted or delivered to the persons mentioned in the third and fourth sections of "The Voters' List Act," the copies required by said section to be transmitted or delivered of the list made, pursuant to said act, of all persons appearing by the last revised Assessment Roll of the said Municipaliy to be entitled to vote in the said Municipality at Elections for members of the Legislative Assembly, and at Municipal Elections; and said list was first posted up at my office at Lot 20, Con. 4, Township of Osprey, on the 24th day of July, 1884, and remains there for inspection.

Electors are called upon to examine the said list, and, if any omissions or any other errors are found therein, to take immediate proceedings to have the said errors corrected according to law.

WILLIAM MILNE,
Clerk of the said Municipality.
Dated the 24th day of July, A.D. 1884

LARDINE MACHINE OIL, is the delight of farmers, and a pleasure to all men using Machinery, it cannot be excelled, it has received the highest awards at Dominion and Provincial Exhibitions. McCall Bros. & Co., sole manufacturers, Toronto.

ANOTHER ACCIDENT.—Mr. Edward Sargent, of Holland, had the two first fingers of his right hand cut off at the second joint and a piece off the other two and thumb on Thursday last by the circular saw in his shingle mill, near Williamsford.

CREDIT AUCTION—Wednesday, July 30th, at Walter's Falls, Wm. King, proprietor; an extensive sale of farm stock, implements, etc. Sale to commence at 1 o'clock. Terms—6 months on sums over $5, on approved paper. W. J. Shepherdson, Auctioneer.

WE are pleased to know that some of our merchants refuse to sell trashy goods. W. J. McFarland returned about fifty boxes of raisins which he could have sold at 85 cents per box, but would not keep them as he considered he would be doing his customers an injury by selling them.

BASE BALL.—A senior base ball club was organized here last Tuesday evening. We are informed that Mr. James Tweed is captain, and Mr. Simon Plewis officiates as Secretary. The club is awaiting any challenges that may be sent them. We hope to see them make a good mark this season.

THE Presbyterian raspberry festival on Wednesday evening was fairly attended. Owing to the grass being wet from the rain in the early part of the day, the party occupied the church where refreshments were provided, after which a short program was gone through and a sociable and pleasant time was spent.

A PIONEER GONE.—Mr Archibald Foster, Sr., one of the pioneers of Artemesia, died on Saturday last, aged 64 years. His remains were deterred in Christ Church cemetry, Markdale, on Sunday, and were followed to their last resting place by a large connection of mourners and a very large concourse of people. Over 70 teams were in the procession.

ON Tuesday morning a train of 23 freight cars was coming up the mountain, approaching Orangeville, when it was found the engine was unable to carry the entire train, and a number of the cars were detached. When partly up the grade, it was found that there were already too many, and a second detachment took place; but the second detached cars rushed back upon the former, with a velocity of 80 miles an hour. Fortunately no one was hurt.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT.—On Saturday last Mr. Henry D. Irwin, a farmer living one and a half miles from this place, was leading his bull out of the stable when the animal became unmanagable and turned on Mr. I., throwing him down and would doubtless have killed him out, but for the prompt assistance of Wm. Cunningham who was at hand and beat the vicious brute back thereby rescuing Mr. Irwin. Dr. Sproule was at once summoned and found his right arm broken and a bad bruise on one leg, also other bruises not so serious. We are glad to learn that he is doing as well as could be expected.

Palmerston, August 22, 1883.—I have had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Verey's Panorama, and I heartily endorse all that has been said about it. It is all it claims to be and much more. By all means go and see it and you will be amply repaid. It is instructive, entertaining and humorous. Mr. Verey is doing a great work and wherever known is highly appreciated by ministers, church members, and all respectable classes of the community. Large numbers saw it in Palmerston, and expressed themselves highly delighted with it. Go and see him for an evening and you will be as enthusiastic in his praises as I am.—Jas. Broley, Pastor of Methodist Church of Canada, Palmerston.

RESCUED AT LAST.

W. H. Crooker, druggist of Watertown, says, when all other remedies fail for Bowel Complaints, then Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry comes to the rescue.

Bear Hunt.

Yesterday Mr. Geo. Hutchenson discovered a "grizzly" crossing the town-line of Artemesia and Euphrasia, near the premises of Mr. Simon Freeman. Chase was instantly given. Rusty muskets, shot guns, rapiers, scythes, and all manner of deadly weapons, even to dung and pitch forks; and one stalwart defender of the sheep fold came armed with a bludgeon that would have done credit to the Oatehite Islander that killed Captain Cook, and avowed a vengeance upon the bear that will no doubt strike terror to the predatory vermin in the future. Boy's and dog's drove bruin out of the swamp, when Mr. Stinson dealt one stunning shot; Mr. Bowler gave him another; but the final stroke was reserved for the unerring aim of Mr. John Weber. His weight was about 300 lbs.

Meaford Road.

From our own correspondent.

It seems that in my last correspondence one item gave great offence to a certain Mr. W. Buchanan. He is accusing me of making false statements injurious to the S. School. Now this I deny, the whole tenor of the item was against certain parties who were grumbling at the discussion of the meeting held by the officials and friends of the S. School. You would think that the S. School was a private affair, wholly under the control of Mr. Buchanan, and that no person had any right to interfere with its business without getting his consent. He says when they want their proceedings published they will get their secretary to do it; as from the tenor of his remarks he is the only capable person to do so. Then he goes on to say that your correspondent some time ago gave a false report of the finances of the school. Who is their correspondent? Is it their secretary who is so capable of giving everything correct? Mr. Buchanan says that there was no decision arrived at about an excursion. Report had it different. Your correspondent was asked by several parties what time the excursion train left the station. Our advice to friend Buchanan is that the next time that he reads an item of correspondence relating to the S. School to read it over twice before he flies off at a tangent. Your correspondent is just as good a friend of the S. School as Mr. Buchanan, if he does happen to be the superintendent.

Maxwell.

A very successful pic-nic, under the auspices of St. Mary's Church Sabbath School was held in Saigohn's grove on Monday last. The day was lovely. A large number attended and a very pleasant time was spent. Markdale Christ Church choir were on hand.

Mr. Thos. Ross, of the South Line, raised a fine frame barn 40 x 60 on Monday. James Wilson happened with an accident, but not of a serious nature, while at above raising.

Mr. Robert Akitt has completed a fine barn 40 x 60.

Mr. Wm. Radley is building a house.

Business in Maxwell is quiet.

The crops through this township are generally light, and some of the oats will scarcely be worth cutting.

County Valuation.

Following is a copy of notice sent to the Various Municipalities in reference to the late County Valuation:—

"In the matter of the Appeals of the Townships of Osprey, Proton and Bentinck against the Equalization of the County of Grey."

At a preliminary meeting before the Judge to-day he instructed every Township to be notified through their Reeve of the Appeal, and fixed Tuesday next for hearing each and every Township which may choose to appear before him.

The Appellants claim that they are assessed for too much good land by the Valuators, and that the land is assessed too high.

The Judge, in equalizing the whole County, will endeavor to assess the Municipalities so that each shall bear a just relation one to another, and for this purpose he is desirous of getting all the information he can. You had better then attend with your Assessor and any other parties you deem well to speak not only as to your own Municipality but also as to neighboring Municipalities.

The Judge holds that he must adhere to the aggregate assessment, and so if he reduces any one or more Municipalities he must add the amount to some or all of the Municipalities of the County. You will see then the importance of your Municipality being represented before the Judge.

Bring your Assessment Rolls of 1883 and 1884.

Dated 17th July, 1884.

JOHN GALE.
JOHN CREASOR, Clerk of Court.
County Solicitor.

INVALUABLE TO EVERY LADY!

"MAY DEW"

The Great French Lotion for Beautifying the Face.

It conceals the evidence of age. One application will make the most stubbornly red and rough hands beautifully soft and white. Remember that "MAY DEW" is not a paint or powder that fills up the pores of the skin, and that is injurious to the skin, but a new and great discovery, a vegetable liquid, that causes the cheek to glow with health, the neck, arms and hands to rival the Lily in whiteness. Impossible to detect in the beauty it confers any artificial character. It cures greasy Skin, Freckles, Wrinkles, Pimples, Black Heads, Crow's Feet, Blotches, Face Grubs, Sun Burn, Tan, Ringworm, Chapped Hands, Sore or Chapped Lips, Barber's Itch, Tetter, etc. It frees the pores, oil glands, and tubes from the injurious effects of powders and cosmetic washes. By its use all redness and roughness are prevented; it beautifies the skin, and will make it soft, smooth and white; imparting a delicious softness; imparting a perfectly healthy, natural and youthful appearance. The best face lotion that the world ever produced. We will send "A LARGE BOTTLE" to any address on receipt of price, $1. When ordering mention this paper.

Address all letters to the MAY DEW AGENCY, 167 Church Street, Toronto, Ont.

READABLE ITEMS.

An Old Organist—Submarine Miners—In a Bear Pit—Public Libraries in Europe—Russian Cemetery at Sebastopol, &c., &c.,

Some months ago a champagne house at Epernay offered prizes for the five best poems on champagne. No fewer than 1,000 poems were sent in.

For seventy-four years the present organist of St. Michael's Church, Coventry, England, has held that position—longer, perhaps, than any person has ever held a similar position before.

It has recently been proposed to prevent petroleum fires by placing a bottle of ammonia in each barrel of the oil; on ignition, by accident or otherwise, the bottle would break, and the effect of the ammoniacal vapors would be to extinguish the fires.

The late Empress Maria Anna of Austria bequeathed a rare and valuable legacy to the treasury of the Dom of Prague, consisting of a magnificent bouquet of thirteen golden roses in a golden vase of old Roman workmanship. The vase stands on a square pedestal, likewise of pure gold.

A corps of submarine miners is in the course of formation at the School of Engineering, Chatham, England. The special duty of this new body of men will be the laying of mines under water for purposes of coast defence. Recruits for this new branch of the service are drawn mainly from the fishing districts. No less than three vessels are undergoing alterations to fit them for the work.

The City of Brussels proposes to try the experiment of using electricity to drive its street cars. One line—that of the Rue de la Loi—is to be equipped with motors, and separate accounts are to be kept, in order to ascertain definitely the cost of the running, as compared with the use of horses. The test is to last for one year, and then, should the result warrant it, electricity will be employed exclusively on the street railways of Brussels.

The French Senatorial Committee on Petitions has unanimously decided on recommending the Government to take steps for the suppression of the Monte Carlo scandal, as urged by an influential Riviera memorial. The movement against the gaming tables has had the effect of holding in abeyance a scheme for converting the concern into a company, with a capital of $12,000,000, which sum was to be extracted mainly from French investors.

A workman fell over the wall of one of the bear-pits in the Jardin des Plantes, Paris, and lay insensible with a bleeding wound in his head. The visitors at once tried to divert the attention of the bears by throwing pieces of bread among them, but one of the beasts walked leisurely to the wounded man and began to lick up his blood. Amid intense excitement the keepers arrived, threw a rope into the pit, and tried to drive the bear off by punching him with sticks. Happily the injured man meanwhile had regained his senses, and presently clutched the rope and was drawn aloft, much to the irritation of the beast, which made no effort to conceal his disappointment.

There died recently in a miserable lodging in Strasburg, Germany, an old man who had valuables to the extent of $600 000 wrapped up in his pocket, yet was unable to spend any of it for his comfort. It was the diamond belonging to Queen Victoria, and valued at that sum, which was stolen from a jeweller's shop in London in 1866, and the jewel was so well known that he dared not offer it for sale. He confessed himself the thief. This is a rare exception which marks the rule that a man must steal large amounts if he would escape the terrors of the law.

The skirmishing drill of the Third Dragoons and Fifteenth Hussars in the recent London tournament is regarded as an idea which may have important developments. Both regiments have practised, though in different ways, the principles of Rarey, and applied them to an object never dreamt of before. The troopers have trained their horses to lie down and remain in that position, even when volleys are fired over them. At a signal they rise, man and horse together, ready to gallop off without a moment's pause. A dozen men and horses may thus lie hidden behind a bank, or in ambush, until the unsuspecting enemy comes within fifty yards.

In a recent speech Cardinal Manning remarked that he was looking with much anxiety at the changes that were going on in his country. There was a time when the master and the man lived on the estate, and differently to what they did now. There was a time when patriarchal care, feeling of human sympathy, of human happiness and of human service prevailed. There had, nowadays, grown up a new world—a world of money, of commerce, of manufacture, and a relationship between master and man that, unlike that of the time past, was not one of sympathy, or benevolence, or patriarchal care, but a relationship of so many shillings per week, paid on the Friday or Saturday. It would be well if this relationship, even in a degree of confidence, affection, and service, could be restored.

A scheme to make up the deficiency in the French budget is that of a decrease in civil service salaries. In this event the minor officials would be well nigh pauperized, unless possessed of private means. In the ministries, and at the Hotel de Ville, a bachelor of arts, on whose education his family have spent about $2,000, begins at sixty cents a day. If he manages to pass the examination and has a little influence besides, he often reaches to $300 per annum, from which is to be deducted a small sum for a provident fund. A Post Office clerk, when not on duty in answering imbecile questions from the most ignorant public in the world in all that relates to practical matters, has to sort and to stamp something like 1,500 or 2,000 letters per day. In Paris he has the magnificent salary of between $450 and $600.

There are over 1,000 public libraries in Germany, Austria, and Switzerland, twenty of which contain more than 100,000 volumes. In Great Britain there are only nine that contain 100 000 volumes, and in France six. Spain has, we told, 30 public libraries, containing 700,000 volumes, of which 220,000 are in the library at Madrid. The library at Washington contains 513,000 volumes and 170 000 pamphlets, and there are but five larger libraries in the world: The French National library, with 2,300 000 volumes; the British Museum, with 1,500,000; the Royal library at St. Petersburg, with 1 000,000; that at Munich, with 900,000, and that at Berlin with 750 000 books.

Mr. Edgar Vincent, the brother of Howard Vincent, the recently retired chief of the London Detective Department, is regarded as the handsomest man in England. He is six feet three inches in height and of splendid proportions. He is also of remarkable ability, having carried everything before him in his university career, and been sent when only 24 to fill the difficult post of Director of Finance in Egypt. Gladys, Lady Lonsdale, the celebrated beauty, to whom he is to be wedded in August, is equally tall as a woman, measuring six feet. The father of the Vincents, Sir Frederick, is a clergyman of the Church of England.

Mr. Vrignot, a smart young Parisian thief, finding himself discovered when intent on lead stealing, promptly entered a house by a skylight and requested a young work woman at her sewing machine to save him. "I'll sit here and peel these potatoes, and when the police come they will conclude that I am your lover." At this interesting juncture the police came, and one collared him on "spec," exclaiming, "Got you at last, my boy." "You hear, my pet," said Vrignot; "these gentlemen mistake me for some other fellow." Miss Melaine, however, who was not fascinated with her impromptu adorer, maintained an ominous silence, and the would-be lover was led off to jail.

The Russian cemetery at Sebastopol would be considered a handsome necropolis anywhere. The men are laid away in batches in great graves, but the officers lie in separate ones. The tombs in many instances are veritable monuments. Among them are a column and bust over the remains of Prince Gortchakoff, Commander-in-Chief of the Russian forces in the Crimea, who died in Warsaw in 1861, but who "desired to be buried amid those defenders of their country who did not permit the enemy to enter their fatherland further than where their graves stand." But the most conspicuous object in the cemetery is a magnificent memorial chapel of granite, marble, and bronze, in the form of a pyramid, over 100 feet high, the walls of which, inside and out, are covered with the names of all who took part in the defence of Sebastopol and for whom prayers are daily offered up.

Stay on the Farm.

The disposition of so many young men to leave the farm and come to the city is not creditable to their intelligence. Every city in the country is overcrowded with this class of helpless young men. They grow up on the farms with no idea of the trials and temptations that beset their class in the large cities. They think they can live in the cities without the trial and drudgery they say is a part of farm life. There are many ways of living in a city, but there is but one honorable way, and that is surmounted with as many trials and hardships as earning one's living on the farm, and that is, to earn it honestly. A young man without a trade will find he has to work harder to make both ends meet in the city than on a farm.

The young man who thinks the world owes him a living and that the obligation will be cancelled in the cities, makes a mistake that is often learned too late. There is no more room for idlers in the city than on the farm. The criminal class receives some of its most vicious recruits from young men who thought they were too smart to be farmers, come to the city, found they had made a mistake, dropped into bad company, and will end their lives on the scaffold or in the penitentiary.

No, young man, you are not too smart for the farm. The smartest man that ever lived hadn't sense enough to reach perfection in farming. Be independent. While there is always something to do on a well-regulated farm, if you have a leisure moment, use it in study or selling the many kinds of goods you will find that are especially made for your benefit. You can always find something to do if you want to work. If you don't, we have no time to reason with you.

An Egyptian Breakfast.

We went to breakfast with Princess Maneur, the Khedive's sister. The meal was of a most elaborate description, consisting of many courses and partaking more of the character of a dinner than a breakfast, or rather dejeuner. The dining-room was luxuriously furnished. In the centre was a large circular velvet carpet, embroidered with gold, on which stood an octangular table, covered with an embroidered velvet cloth, on which the breakfast service, including napkins worked with gold thread, was arranged in the European fashion, a vacant place being left in the middle for the silver plateaux containing the successive courses. As affording some idea of the resources of Egyptian culinary art, it may perhaps be mentioned that we were offered in the following order soup, roast turkey, calves' head stuffed with forcemeat, pillau of rice and raisins, macaroni cheese, kabobs of mutton on skewers, asparagus a la'huile, pancakes, cream rice tart, pastry and jam, milk of almonds in a bowl, with pistachio nuts, eaten with tortoise-shell spoons, and cheese, followed by dessert, with ices and little cakes, and ending with coffee, which was served in another room. On the table itself were several varieties of hors d'œuvre such as anchovies, olives, potted meats, a sort of bitter white sauce, and clotted cream. Champagne and other wines were handed round. The party consisted of eight persons, and the entire meal was served within 40 minutes—remarkably quick work, considering the length of the menu. Each guest was provided with a beautifully embroidered Turkish towel, and water was brought to us in large silver basins after dinner to wash our hands in.

If woman's dress does not sensibly approximate to man's, in spite of reformers' efforts, the names of its component parts do. What with "ladies'" "coats," "vests," and "pants," the most sensitive modesty cannot be offended. It is a pity dry-goods stores will not extend this regard for women's feelings far enough to put female clerks on their counters of "ladies'" underclothing. Women resent deeply the having to inquire about the fit and condition of such articles from male clerks; and yet many stores which employ girls in other departments pick out young men for there, and women trade there because they must. It would pay the ones which have girls at these to advertise the fact freely.

The King of Cambodia and his People.

M. Delaporte, a Lieutenant on board a French war vessel, gives an account of a recent visit to King Norodom of Cambodia. "The royal residence," he says, "is a town in itself. Several thousand people are lodged in the enclosure, all of whom are attached to the service of the King. At the end of the first courtyard, surrounded by different kinds of buildings, stands the European palace, which is quite similar to the dwellings of the rich merchants of Saigon. Behind that, in another enclosure, is the native habitation, gardens, and huts. This is the division set apart for the harem, and is closed to the profane. The mandarins are the most energetic purveyors of the harem. They hope to obtain favor by giving their best-looking daughters to the King. The women are allowed to go out, and, by one of those strange caprices common enough among the monarchs of the East, who are by turns cruel and paternal, they are allowed to marry, the King giving up all his claims at the request of the lovers. But, on the other hand, any attempt to enter the sacred harem surreptitiously is punished with the utmost severity. The first time I visited Cambodia, a young bonze, in high favor at the court, was discovered flirting with one of the prettiest wives of Norodom. The latter, according to the usual custom, ordered the two lovers to be buried alive. The accused, however, escaped the punishment through the intervention of the old queen mother, who is a zealous Buddhist devotee. Since that time it appears that the fair sex have not become wiser, but their punishment has been changed. On returning from our expedition, the King, who had come to visit the chief of the French protectorate, asked for some details as to the European method of executing, or rather shooting, criminals. M. Moura, without attaching much importance to the question, gratified his Majesty's curiosity. But what was our astonishment when two hours afterward we learned that four young women of the harem had been shot in the European military style, and their heads taken off and hung up for the encouragement of the other ladies of the household.

"The King received us cordially, and promised to facilitate to the utmost of his ability our archæological researches. Afterward he asked for one of our doctors. He was lamed by a recent fall, and it is an article of faith in Cambodia that an infirm or lame king is unfit to govern. He told us in confidence that he was obliged, in conformity with the superstitious customs of his subjects, to consult innumerable quacks, astrologers, and diviners. None of them was able to cure him, and all agreed in imputing to evil spirits the persistence of his trouble. Our doctor immediately placed himself at the disposition of his Majesty. Ceremony required that the august invalid could only be examined through the intermediary of one of his wives, but the doctor convinced him of the insufficiency of this method, and a close examination of the hurt was made and the remedies applied.

"On going out of the palace we found at the door a group of bonzes on their knees, praying for the recovery of the King. Others were going through the streets chanting and singing psalms. Public prayer had been ordered throughout the kingdom. Around the pagodas and in front of every house tall bamboo canes were placed and dressed with ribbons of various colors. Beside the statues of Buddha, at the cross roads and in the interior of the Chinese dwellings, odoriferous torches were kept burning. Trade was suspended. The people appeared outdoors in their holiday costumes. In the evening and late at night the streets were filled with people carrying torches or lanterns. The sounds of the gong and of the tam-tam were mixed with the constant detonations of fire crackers, and the sky was continually streaked with rockets, whose explosions and brilliancy were intended to drive away the bad spirits that were bent on tormenting the sovereign.

"The next day we met a sort of cortege, composed of about twenty natives, who were marching in file, and before whom the crowd of people opened a passage with great respect. This was the escort of the little son of Norodom, who was out for an airing. The child was seated upon the shoulder of a little dignitary of the court. A servant walked behind and shaded him with a parasol. This royal baby was dressed in a silk gown of a brilliant color. He wore a necklace and bracelets, and on his ankles were rings of gold. His hair was shaved, with the exception of a little topknot carefully rolled up on the summit of his skull, and this was surmounted by one of those white jasmine flowers whose sweet perfume the women here prize highly, and they gladly make offerings of it on the altars of Buddha."

CLIFF DWELLERS.

The Remains of Ancient Races in Arizona.

Arizona has a history which has never been written, says a letter to the San Francisco Chronicle. It is only told by the empty irrigating canals, the ruins of populous towns, vacant cliff dwellings, inscribed rocks, and broken pottery found in many parts of the territory. Before the European saw this continent two races had lived and died in Arizona. The earliest people built their houses in valleys that are now deep ravines, and the cliff dwellings that are seen to-day resting in the sides of deep arroyos two hundred feet above the bottom of the gorge once stood upon solid ground, and yet so many years have elapsed since then that now the houses are high and dry and accessible only to hardy climbers. Time has dug away the foundations as well as scarred and chipped the habitations. Between the age of the cliff dwellers and that of the white man come the race who built the canals and farmed the valleys. Dry and parched and barren as a great part of Arizona is to day, there was a time, of which abundant proof exists, when the valleys were rich and fertile and when great cities were populated by an active, capable, and energetic people. Who were these industrious beings? No one can tell. Toltec or Aztec, black or white, from Egypt or from Peru, none can say. Time has nearly destroyed evidences of their existence. In the lapse of ages their history has grown almost a mythology. What a race they were, though! No farming for them, if you please, on any small scale. They had ditches to bring water to their crops that would astonish the soil-tillers of to-day, and their houses were castles.

Perhaps the most extensive of their ruins now are at a placed called Casa Grande, in the Gila river valley, six miles below Florence and five miles south of the river. When first discovered by the Spaniards, in 1540 the largest building of the group was four stories high and had walls six feet in thickness. A hundred years ago one house still remained which was 420x260 feet. To-day there is but a suggestion left of the former magnificence of the houses, but one may still see that the walls were made of mud and gravel, held together by a hard cement, and the rooms are still coated with cement. Near Casa Grande are the remains of an irrigating canal which has been traced for forty miles, and which must have watered thousands of acres which to-day are dry, neglected wastes. Miles of these wide canals can be seen scattered over the territory. Everywhere are the evidences of a prehistoric occupation of the land. In building the city of Prescott, workmen unearthed not only household and farming implements, but discovered old foundations as well, and as Arizona is settled and explored there may yet be found more traces of the people who lived and died here, leaving no suggestion as to who they were, where they came from, whither they went. What care we for Pompeii? We have a vaster, richer field in which to search for treasures hid for untold ages.

WOMAN'S MOOD.

A red-headed New York society girl rides a sorrel horse to match her hair.

Don't buy a coach in order to please your wife. It is much cheaper to make her a little sulky.

While it is better to be born lucky than rich, it is better to marry a poor girl with a sweet temper than a rich girl with a red-headed one.

"Frog limbs" is the modest sign displayed in a New York restaurant controlled by a woman.

At marriage the bride always meets her bethrothed at the altar with gloves on, but after her marriage she generally handles her husband without gloves.

"I hope your uncle won't give me away," remarked young Augur to Miss Gimlet. "Don't you worry about that. He never gives anything away. He's a pawnbroker."

A Vermont girl, who has married a young man by the name of William, says that she intends no treason in affirming that hereafter she will follow the dictates of her own sweet will.

Maude has come into the garden (of journalism) at last—Miss Maude C. Major, at Norfolk, Neb. Don't know the name of her paper, but "Only a Pansy Blossom" would have been appropriate, or say the Norfolk Narcissus."

A Stock Yards girl was asked this morning, if she had ever been married. "No," she replied with alacrity; "but I've sued seven gentlemen for breach of promise, and feel as though I were just good and ready enough to tackle another."

Mendora Hoffman married the Marquis De Mores, who has large landed interests in the North West. In St. Paul she is the most richly and tastefully dressed woman you will see. On the plains she rides and shoots faultlessly. Galloping over the prairie, an eagle plume in her hat and a rifle slung from her saddle, she is the picture of wild beauty.

How Savages use Hot Springs.

The geysers of New Zealand are found on the North Island, scattered through the area which extends from Tongariro (a semi-active volcanic cone), in about the centre of the island, to the Bay of Plenty. They have long been known to the natives, who have no traditions as to their age, but from time immemorial have used the quiet hot springs to warm their huts and to cook their food. Every hut has its boiler close to the door; bread is baked on large slabs of stone placed over the hottest portions of the ground; and on others, not quite so hot, the lazy recline, wrapped in blankets, enjoying Vulcan's heat. In these respects the Maoris have the advantage over our North American Indians, who have always avoided the Yellowstone region on account of their superstitious fears.

The springs of Savu-Savu on Vanu Levu, in the Feejee Islands, are pseudo-geysers. The latter were owned by an old woman who was captured by a chief in 1863, and cooked in her own springs. Miss C. F. Gordon Cumming, referring to this, says: "She was past 70, and must have been very tough and smoke-dried, but as in her younger days she had been a regular Joan of Arc, leading her tribe to battle, and herself fighting hand to hand with a hatchet, he determined to eat her. So he had her cooked with the sixteen men, and made a great feast, and then to spite the people, before leaving the district, he attempted to choke up all of the springs, in which amiable effort he partially succeeded. These springs were also a favorite place for depositing all superfluous babes, especially girls, who never got much of a welcome. They were popped in alive, like so many lobsters, and treated with quite as little ceremony."—Popular Science Monthly.

What a Woman Can Do.

She can say "No," and stick to it for all time. She can also say "No" in such a low, soft voice that it means "Yes." She can sharpen a lead-pencil if you give her plenty of time and plenty of pencils. She can dance all night in a pair of shoes two sizes too small for her, and enjoy every minute of the time. She can pass a display window of a draper's store without stopping—if she is running to catch the train. She can walk half the day with a noisy baby in her arms without once expressing the desire to murder the infant.

She can appreciate a kiss from her husband seventy-five years after the marriage ceremony has taken place. She can suffer abuse and neglect for years, which one touch of kindness or consideration will drive from her recollection. She can go to church, and afterwards tell you what every woman in the congregation had on, and in some rare instances give a faint idea of what the text was. She can look her husband square in the eyes when he tells her some cock-and-bull story about being "detained at the office," without betraying in the least that she knows him to be a colossal liar.

She can—but what's the use? A woman can do anything or everything, and do it well. She can do more in a minute than a man can in an hour, and do it better. She can make the alleged lords of creation bow down to her own sweet will, and they will never know it. Yes, a woman can do everything, with but one exception; she cannot climb a tree.

Origin of the Names of the Days of the Week.

In the museum at Berlin, in the [illegible] voted to Northern antiquities, [illegible] representations of the idols from [illegible] the names of the days of the week [illegible] rived. From the idol of the Sun [illegible] day. This idol is represented with [illegible] like the sun, holding a burning wheel [illegible] both hands on his breast, signifying [illegible] parent course around the world. [illegible] of the Moon, from which comes Monday, [illegible] habited in a short coat, like a man, [illegible] holding the moon in his hands. [illegible] from which comes Tuesday, was one of [illegible] most ancient and popular gods of the [illegible] mans, and represented in his grim [illegible] skin, according to their peculiar mode [illegible] clothing; the third day of the week [illegible] dicated to his worship. Woden, from [illegible] comes Wednesday, was a valiant [illegible] among the Saxons. His image was [illegible] to for victory. Thor, from whence [illegible] Thursday, is seated in a bed, with [illegible] stars above his head, holding a sceptre [illegible] his hand. Friga, from whence we [illegible] Friday, is represented with a drawn [illegible] in his right hand and a bow in [illegible] Seater, from which is Saturday, has the [illegible] pearance of perfect wretchedness. [illegible] thin-visaged, long-haired, with [illegible] beard. He carries a pail of water [illegible] right hand wherein are fruits and flowers.

An Escaped Comet.

During the last four years some [illegible] have paid visits to the ruler of the solar [illegible] tem and displayed their dazzling [illegible] the admiration of his attendant [illegible] Every one of these comets has been [illegible] able for some unusual or unaccountable [illegible] duct. The big comet of 1881 suddenly [illegible] ed its streaming tail into the northern [illegible] isphere unannounced and unexpected [illegible] surprised the astronomers at their [illegible] copes as much as it did the milkman on [illegible] early morning visits to the pumps. [illegible] comet of 1882 amazed the world by [illegible] ly appearing at broad noon close to the [illegible] where it soared like a fiery bird with [illegible] wings extended, and as it retreated [illegible] the solar system it appeared to be [illegible] by a bevy of little comets to which it [illegible] apparently given birth during the [illegible] its plunge through the flaming banners [illegible] sun. In 1883 the comet of 1813 reappeared. But the most extraordinary comet of [illegible] the one which was discovered at the [illegible] observatory about a month ago. It [illegible] to have been clearly seen, for the observers [illegible] carefully measured its position among the [illegible] stars, and it was believed from its [illegible] motions that it was one of the comets [illegible] returning. But after thus showing [illegible] the comet disappeared, and, although a [illegible] battery of telescopes has been brought [illegible] bear upon the spot where it appeared, [illegible] nearly every observatory in Europe [illegible] glimpse of the mysterious visitor from [illegible] realms of outer space has been caught.

Unexpected Prizes.

An English clergyman obtained an excellent position for having refused preferment offered to him under circumstances derogatory to his dignity. He was a fair man, and a vulgar plutocrat, who had invited him to dinner, promised to give him a living if he would sing a comic song at dessert. A quiet rebuke which the young clergyman administered made the plutocrat ashamed of himself, so that the next day he proffered his living with a letter of apology; but the offering was refused, the clergyman stating that it would be impossible for him to forget the circumstances under which it was first tendered. This was the more honorable, as the clergyman was very badly off. Another patron, hearing of what he had done, pointed him to a benefice as a testimonial of his admiration. We may conclude with the story of a man who was suddenly made rich because of his great stupidity. He was an only dull man in a bright witted family, and going to dine with a very wealthy relative who had a horror of fools, he made so many silly remarks that the old man cried out in exasperation: "I must do something for you, for you'll never do anything for yourself. If I don't make a rich man of you you'll become a laughing stock to the whole hotel and drank glass after glass of whiskey. and a disgrace to your family."

A Novel Revenge.

A maid servant was discharged, but [illegible] to remain until the end of her month. [illegible] invented a retaliation which has proved [illegible] most ingenious and effective of any that [illegible] the Utica Observer heard off, except those involving the perpetrator in danger [illegible] punishment. The house had a commanding overlook of a park in which suicides have been committed. The mistress was [illegible] mally affected by anything weird and [illegible] So the maid told her of the suicides, [illegible] ed out from the window the spot where [illegible] poor fellow had hanged himself, where [illegible] one had died by drowing, and where [illegible] other had blown his brains away. [illegible] added, with a shrug and shudder, that [illegible] fancied she could see them o' nights, [illegible] ghosts of the self-slain hunting the place [illegible] their crimes. The old woman was horrified. She could not look at the park, which had previously been a solace to her eyes, without descrying the points which the girl had invested with gruesome interest. She has gone to Newport for the summer, and will never return to her home alongside the park.

A Disinfectant.

In cases of diphtheria or other contagious diseases, a German physician recommends a mixture of equal parts, say 40 drops of turpentine and carbolic acid put into a pint kettle of water, and allowed to simmer slowly over the fire in the same room with the patient. The atmosphere of the sick room must be kept constantly impregnated with the odor of the substance. In several cases of diphtheria there was no attempt at isolation of the patient, and the nurse cared for sick and well without spreading the disease.

Turning White.

We saw on our streets last Saturday evening an old negro woman about 70 years of age, who was at one time a dark piece of cake color, but now has turned white, with the exception of a few liver-colored [illegible] on her face and arms. "Aunt Kitty" [illegible] that the remaining spots are disappearing very fast, and if she is spared to live a few years longer it will be one instance to be recorded on the pages of history where a negro was born black and buried white.—Natchez Democrat Record.

[illegible] BY A RATTLESNAKE.

[illegible] Bitten by one of his Reptile Collection.

[illegible]'s Park at Highbridge, just to the [illegible] Kyle's Hotel, is a large white oblong [illegible] Each side of the entrance are adorned [illegible] huge dime museum oil paintings. [illegible] represents a dark-skinned man smilingly [illegible] large stream of fire, and the other a [illegible] fair girl, gracefully reclining on a red [illegible] Above the entrance is painted an immense snake holding a cow in its jaws, while [illegible] sign announces that everything inside is alive, and that the show is going on [illegible] time.

James Reilly owns the show, and is [illegible] known as a snake charmer. Mr. Chas. [illegible] Clark is manager and fire-eater, and [illegible] Clark's wife is the Circassian girl. The admission to the show is five cents, and the [illegible] fee of admision, combined with the [illegible] curiosities and hidden music, draws large [illegible]

The chief attraction of the show, next to the Circassian girl and a young female gorilla, [illegible] three diamond-back rattlesnakes, [illegible] Mr. Reilly caught in Mexico, and [illegible] says, are the only ones of the kind [illegible] country.

[illegible] o'clock Sunday afternoon twenty [illegible] posters had been given, and Mr. Reilly, [illegible] to stimulate the curiosity of the [illegible] and to prove to them that the things [illegible] were, took one of his rattlesnakes in [illegible] hands and went out to exhibit it to the [illegible] Mr. Reilly is a muscular man of [illegible] height, with light hair, blue eyes, [illegible] heavy moustache. His friends say that [illegible] a man of dauntless nerve, and that [illegible] he drinks.

The snakes were kept all together in a [illegible] square box with a glass cover. Mr. [illegible] Reilly owned them a little more than a [illegible] week, and during that time they have been [illegible] fed once. Mr. Clark, the manager, [illegible] has only needed to eat once a year, [illegible] each of them swallowed a live rabbit [illegible] whole, after having first charmed [illegible]

The smallest of the three rattlers had recently shed his skin and [illegible] WAS GETTING HUNGRY.

[illegible] the morning he had shown signs of [illegible] hunger, and when Reilly took him out of [illegible] box to exhibit him outside the tent, the [illegible] made an attempt to bite him, which it [illegible] never done before. Clark called Reilly's [illegible] attention to it, and told him to be careful, [illegible] but Reilly grasped the snake firmly by [illegible] the neck and laughingly remarked, "I can [illegible] do worse than he can bite." Then he [illegible] went inside the tent with the snake wrapped [illegible] around his neck, holding it firmly with [illegible] his right hand, just below the head. In a [illegible] few moments several hundred people gathered [illegible] to see the snake charmer played with his [illegible] pet.

Among the spectators were three young [illegible] men somewhat elevated with the beer [illegible] they had drunk. They guyed the snake [illegible] charmer, asked him who pulled the snake's [illegible] teeth, and whether it was not too old to [illegible] bite. Reilly became irritated, and [illegible] arrogantly. He was holding the snake [illegible] on a large table with both hands. To [illegible] emphasize his remarks, he let go with one [illegible] hand, dropping the body of the snake upon [illegible] the table. As he did so the grip of his right [illegible] hand, which was about the snake's neck was [illegible] relaxed.

[illegible] In a flash, the snake's head darted out. [illegible] Its wide-closed eyes flashed fire. His jaws [illegible] opened wide, and, before Reilly was aware [illegible] of the danger, the snake's fangs were

[illegible] IN THE BACK OF HIS RIGHT HAND,

[illegible] between the thumb and forefinger.

[illegible] The crowd yelled and fell back, thinking [illegible] the snake would be dropped among [illegible] them. But Reilly was not that kind of a man. [illegible] With his left hand he pulled the snake back [illegible] to its former position, and, renewing the [illegible] hold of his wounded hand, carried him [illegible] into the tent and replaced him among his [illegible] fellows.

[illegible] Then two thousand people crowded in [illegible] front of the tent, while Clark ran for assistance. [illegible] Reilly had told Clark that a bite from the [illegible] snake was sure death, and he repeated this [illegible] to the crowd around him. After he had [illegible] succeeded in emptying the tent he went [illegible] into the hotel and drank glass after glass [illegible] of whiskey.

[illegible] While Clark had been vainly searching [illegible] for a physician. He returned in half an [illegible] hour accompanied by six policemen, carrying [illegible] a stretcher. Reilly, encouraged and addressed [illegible] all around him, had been steadily [illegible] drinking whiskey, and when his partner arrived [illegible] the barkeeper said he had taken more than [illegible] a pint. He was placed on a [illegible] stretcher and taken to the police station.

[illegible] There he was waiting for an ambulance [illegible] from the Case of 330 West Fifty-ninth street [illegible] had been called in. He approved of the whiskey [illegible] treatment, and administered as much more [illegible] whiskey as could be forced down, at the same time [illegible] making deep incisions in the man's hand in the [illegible] neighborhood of the wound. Dr. Case [illegible] noticed a depression of the action of the heart [illegible] following. The man was almost pulseless.

[illegible] Reilly, who was semi-unconscious when [illegible] not drinking whiskey,

[illegible] MECHANICALLY SUCKED HIS WOUND.

[illegible] He had been doing so ever since the snake [illegible] bit him.

[illegible] The physicians at the Ninety-ninth St. [illegible] hospital, where he arrived at 6½ o'clock, [illegible] said the only thing which would have [illegible] saved his recovery would have been prompt [illegible] amputation of the right hand. The wound [illegible] was in danger. Nothing could then be done [illegible] but to continue the treatment of [illegible] whiskey already begun. Whiskey was [illegible] poured steadily down his throat, and frequent [illegible] injections of the liquor were made under the [illegible] skin in order that the alcohol might [illegible] more rapidly mingle with the blood.

[illegible] About 9 o'clock Sunday night Reilly was [illegible] resting easy and little hope was entertained of [illegible] his recovery. A puffy, dropsical-like swelling [illegible] had risen to a height of several inches [illegible] around the wound and was gradually extending [illegible] up the forearm as the poison penetrated [illegible] more into the system. At that [illegible] time the quantity of alcohol taken by the [illegible] man was sufficient to have killed any man [illegible] under ordinary circumstances. The doctors [illegible] knew that while the poison acting as an anti- [illegible] dote could not contain enough liquor to [illegible] kill. The patient frequently vomited [illegible]

[illegible] The greatest interest was felt in the case [illegible] in the whole hospital staff, and two or more [illegible] were constantly in attendance at his bedside. [illegible] Dr. Reilly's partner, said "It's [illegible] a wonder that Reilly should have been so [illegible] foolish as to when he told me a dozen time that [illegible] he knew one of these diamond back rattlers [illegible] was sure death. But the fast is he [illegible] was afraid of anything. The snake that [illegible]

Through the long hours of Sunday night Reilly turned and tossed on his cot in the tent annex of the Ninety-ninth Street hospital. With each succeeding hour until not even the frightful quantity of stimulants constantly forced upon him could afford him monentary unconsciousness or respite Substantial nourishment of any kind was out of the question, and only occasional sips of iced milk could be forced down his parched throat.

As the morning came his sufferings still increased. His throat seemed gradually closing up, and it was almost impossible to make him swallow the amount of whiskey absolutely necessary to sustain life. The injections of alcohol under the skin were made all the more frequently on that account, but his sufferings were so great as to counteract its effect. After midnight he did not loose consciousness for a moment. He talked little, but clearly and to the point. Dr. Spaulding the house surgeon, who was constantly with him, said he never saw a man endure such agony with so much courage. Reilly refused to allow anyone to fan him or to put him self out in any way on his account.

Dozens of physicians called during the day but none could suggest any treatment different from that pursued. Early in the morning gangrene set in. The hand grew black as ink all around the wound, which remained a light purple. The swelling which was very great, increased until the hand was more than

THREE TIMES ITS NATURAL SIZE.

The black swelling spread constantly until the gangrene had reached above the elbow. It was then evident that the man must die. The gangrene alone would prove fatal unless the arm could be amputated at the shoulder, and that operation would have certainly killed the patient, as it was impossible for him to rally sufficiently to bear it.

At 10 A. M. Father McEvoy visited the dying man and administered the Sacrament to him. Reilly fainted several times, and once it seemed as though he were dead. The priest drew back and exclaimed:

"There, he is gone already."

Reilly came to, however, but refused afterwards to speak.

Numerous letters and telegrams containing suggestions were received, and one man, a farmer named Purdy, brought his remedy in person, which he was permitted to try. It was a decoction of herbs, with which the wounded arm was washed, the herbs being used as a plaster over the hand.

When everything had been arranged to suit Purdy, Reilly turned his face to the wall and in a few moments dropped off to sleep for the first time since his treacherous pet bit him. After a short nap he awoke, and it was evident that the destructive work of the venom had been going on during his sleep. The black swelling had reached his shoulder and was spreading down his side beneath the arm. His face twitched painfully which he suffered, and the heart had almost lost its action from the effect of the poisoned blood passing through it. His pulse had almost stopped. His eyes were growing glassy, and all his skin was gradually becoming discolored. Decomposition seemed almost to have set in before death.

At six o'clock in the evening Mary Clark, the Circassian girl, came in and sat at the head of the bed, while her husband stood at the foot with the rest. Reilly was still conscious, and his face was lighted up as he recognized her, but his suffering had weakened him beyond the power to speak.

Purdy's treatment was continued at intervals and as much whiskey was administered to him as he could take, which was but little. He grew constantly weaker, however, the action of the heart grew almost imperceptible, and at seven minutes past eight he drew several deep breaths, the action of the heart ceased entirely, and he was finally delivered from pain altogether. He had suffered heroically for twenty-eight hours.

For two hours after Reilly died his friends and those who had witnessed his sufferings remained together. All agreed that he had shown the greatest pluck throughout, not having uttered a single complaint. Purdy stayed too, and it was nearly ten o'clock when he gathered his herbs together and sadly departed. He said he could have cured Reilly if he could have arrived in time, and many of those who at first were the most skeptical admitted that he might have done so.

A Natural Curiosity.

A natural curiosity, that bids fair to outrival the famous Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, has just been discovered on the farm of John Davis, who resides six miles east of Jacksboro, Campbell County, Tenn. Only one chamber has been explored thus far, and that only partly, in which prehistoric mummies, with sandals on their feet, in excellent state of preservation, have been found, some petrified, others preserved by salt in the cave. The walls of the chamber are decorated with paintings of extinct or imaginary animals. A large stream abounds with blind fish. Mr. Davis has captured a species of jackal or red fox, and the cave seems to be alive with both animal and vegetable life. Crickets as large as English sparrows hop or leisurely walk off when alarmed, and rats as large as jackrabbits run about in semi-domesticated recognition. Footprints of exquisite mold are well defined in the hardened mud, and miniature forests along the banks of the river are clothed in snow white foliage and sensitive flowers.

Uncomfortable People.

We all know them; they are in every community, in every church, in many families. They are always uncomfortable themselves, and they inflict discomfort on everybody else. A really aggressive and well-developed specimen will overshadow a locality like a banyan tree, yielding the whole year through all manner of fruit bitter to the taste, and not to be digested without serious injury. These people supply an ample stock of friction; they bring out the latent possibilities of general unpleasantness in a large or small circle; they sow seeds of discord, not only in the fallow ground, but by the wayside, and are followed by abundant harvests of the kind that are sown with joy, but reaped with tears.

Sensational Journalism.

The supply of scandals in the newspapers has increased perceptibly since the "war of rates" began, the idea seeming to be that cheap journalism to be successful, must also be nasty. Not only is the country scoured for vile private scandals, which would never otherwise extend beyond the narrow limits of the towns and villages in which they occur, but the newspapers themselves are engaging in the detective business, and in a larger and more thorough way performing the function which formerly belonged exclusively to the police courts. So soon as a scandal comes to light anywhere nowadays many of even the great metropolitan dailies let loose a horde of reporters on its trail. They investigate it in all its ramifications, interview all the parties to it, secure statements from both sides, and publish the whole nauseating story to the world, omitting no filthy detail which can be obtained. The most conspicuous portions of our leading morning journals in all our large cities are given up to this kind of news, and the search for it becomes more eager each day. There is scarcely a newspaper in any city between here and San Francisco which is not made unfit for family reading by the presence of this kind of matter.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star

is one of the hits. Not that a carriage top is anything new, but the great want of something more perfect than the heavy, expensive, inconvenient tops in use, suggested the invention of the Conboy Adjustable Top, which has been altered and improved until it now stands without a rival. The styles and grades now manufactured are the most popular, and are varied enough to suit all tastes. Mr. Conboy is the Pioneer in this business. It has been his aim since the commencement to merit the patronage and confidence of the trade and the public, by producing durable and convenient, and at the same time, elegant and stylish tops, that could be sold at exceedingly low prices. That this end has been attained is abundantly proved by the thousands sold, and the numerous letters of approval received from the leading carriage builders throughout the country. Since moving to Toronto, Mr. Conboy is giving his whole attention to the improvement and manufacture of carriage tops, where his increased facilities, his practical knowledge and his numerous patented improvements, give him great advantages over all competitors. 407 KING STREET WEST, TORONTO ONT

SAW MILL AND TIMBER LAND FOR SALE OR TO LET

In the Township of Artemesia, County of Grey, 4 miles from Flesherton Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The mill is situated at L ttle Falls, in a block of about 400 acres timber and, with other timber land surrounding. The building is substantially built on stone foundation. The machinery is all good and driven with great power by a 23 inch Leffell wheel, under 36 ft. head of water. There are one large circular saw for cutting logs, 2 small circulars for sawing lath and broom handles, 1 guage lathe for turning broom handles, etc., 1 shingle machine with jointer and packer complete. The water power is excellent, the stream being very regular. There are several other good mill sites on the proyerty. The land in valley is considered the best in the country. The place would make an excellent stock farm when the timber is taken off.

This offers a good opportunity for a practical, energetic man to go into this kind of business, as the place will be sold or let on liberal terms.

The bush is so convenient to the mill logs can be trucked in summer time. Immediate possession given.

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—Having a little spare time on my hands, I have concluded to write you a letter. Two motives prompt me to do so. In the first place I have never contributed anything to the STANDARD except my subscription and some school reports: and in the second place, so many of the good folk of Markdale have asked me about Lyons Head, that by your leave, I should like to tell them somewhat concerning this wonderful place.

Every literary work with any pretensions to respectability has a preface. So must mine, being decidedly respectable; and it shall be like majority of prefaces, without any connection with the rest of the work. As an introduction then to the history of Lyons Head let me tell you how I got home, with my adventures by the way.

I left Markdale for Owen Sound by the "mixed" on Friday the 4th inst. I have never before travelled by a mixed freight train of that ilk, and I was so much amused by the experience that I shall risk the waste-basket and tell you all about it. "Vain are my weak endeavors" to describe my fellow travellers who helped to render the journey in that dingy old cab a trifle less wearisome. They were somewhat as follows:—A tall, lean man with sombre countenance and general aspect of seediness and the profoundest melancholy; opposite to him, a fatman with fiery face and "Sarkastikal" eye that seemed more emphatically than words, to bid us stand off; the conductor a big strapping, pompous fellow who strode through the cab and punched your ticket with the air of one who was born to be an emperor and had risen to be conductor of a "mixed," and lastly an intensely amusing pair either newly married and out on the wedding tour, or a young man out with his girl, and the reckless way in which they ogled and hugged the journey through was decidedly refreshing.

I sat down on the dirty uncushioned bench just as the train starts with a bang and a mighty jerk. The tall man grasps convulsively at something and misses it. I looked on in silent awe, fully expecting to hear the "Rattle of the bones," or to see him become, disjointed, and fly to peices. To my relief he holds together and folding himself up like a half shut jack knife managed to sit down. The fat man glares fiercely around; the conductor stalks majectically up and down; the couple at the rear end leer and giggle and spoon as if life were all a holiday and the shabby old cab a new circus with free side shows; and your humble servant forgets the jolting and banging while busy taking in the show. You will have noticed that some persons and things improve on acquaintance while some others do not, but rather seem to grow harder with longer acquaintance. Especially is this latter the case with an uncoushioned seat in a mixed train. We were not long under way when I noticed the lean man uneasily shifting his position as if in search of a soft spot in the seat, or some position that would make it seem softer. Failing to find either he rummaged about until, in a corner, he found a small piece of cushion which he spread on the seat and coiling himself up on this resigned himself to his fate. Satisfied that he is disposed of for the journey, and finding my own part of the seat growing rapidly harder, I go out and stand on the platform to meditate. When tired of that I return and find all nearly as before. The lean man is rolling about with every motion of the train, the fat man looks a trifle more "Sarkastikal," the conductor a trifle more pompous, and the pair at the back more deliciously spoony than ever; between these various scenes of interest I contrive to pass the time until the last whistle blows and we draw up at Owen Sound. We have scarcely stopped when the fierce man grasps his baggage and bolts, followed more leisurely by the conductor. The tall man slowly uncoils himself, raises his head a little, lowers his feet, and with a mighty effort and by slow stages, unfolds himself until at length he reaches his proper level when he solemnly takes unto himself his worldly goods and limply departs. The cooing doves are the only ones disgusted with the stoppage. No doubt they wish the trip had been to the North Pole instead of to Owen Sound as they have clearly enough spoons in stock to last them until their return. With a final flourish they pick themselves up and go, leaving your chronicler to close the procession. Very weary wo-be-gone we must have looked as we emerged from that dingy old cab into the rain. If diogenes had stood among the loafers who saw us light he would surely have thrown away his lantern and congratulated himself on finding some honest folks at last; for truly some of us looked seedy enough, and others old fashioned enough to be honest; and if honesty, considered in its fullest sense, is not always seedy, in these degenerate days it is decidedly old fashioned.

But here I am only in Owen Sound and I thought I could tell you about the Salvation Army and the remainder of my journey home. However my letter has grown long so long that I must leave these items for next week.

M. NORRIS.

A Pleasant Gathering.

On Monday evening last the residence to our interprising townsman and leading merchant, W. J. McFarland, Esq., presented a very handsome appearance, being tastefully decorated outside with evergreen and flags, and brilliantly illuminated by some fifty chineese lanterns, while tokens of mirth and happy greetings were exchanged by over 40 within, who had assembled on the occasion of a brief stay of Dr. Armstrong, late of this place, and Miss Lazier, niece of Mrs. McFarland, whose marriage notice may be seen in another colum. Our esteemed friend, the Dr., was as unassuming and perhaps more mirthful than usual, while his accomplished, and ever cheerful bride, has lost none of her natural gift of making those in her society feel happy. A rich repast was pertaken of and an exceedingly enjoyable evening spent.

Personals.

Mr. A. Chellew, of Collingwood, visited his father-in-law, John Lyons, Esq., this week.

Miss Eva Burch, daughter of Mr. Burch, of the firm of Tait, Burch & Co., Toronto, is visiting friends in Markdale.

Mr. J. S. Plewis, of Shelburne gave us a call Wednesday.

Our genial friend W. A. Luke, of Brampton, is spending his holidays with friends in Markdale and vicinity.

Mr. and Mrs. Burrit and son and Miss Tate of Meaford spent Sunday in Markdale. They assisted the Methodist choir at evening service.

Mr. H. Buck, of Norwood, is visiting at C. Reynolds, Markdale. Mr. C. Waters is also visiting there.

Mr. Hill, of Stayner, visited his son, A. H., tailor, of this place this week.

Mrs. Luke, of Collingwood, is visiting friend in the vicinity of Markdale.

Mrs. Alex. Neilson, of Dundalk, and Mrs. Jas. Skene of Latona, visited friends in Markdale this week.

Rev. J. and Mrs. Galloway and family visited Markdale last week.

Dr. Armstrong and bride spent a day in Markdale on their way to Port Arthur this week.

Miss. Hattie Mathews returned from Parry Sound last week.

Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Hill returned on Wednesday after an extended visit in Southern Ontario and Michigan.

Our jovial friend Wes. Winsby returned to-day from Manitoulin.

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

The appeals of Proton and Osprey against the County Valuation were heard last week in Owen Sound before the County Judge. It is considered that they made out a fair case, and their representatives expect a decision in favor of their municipalities.

Notwithstanding the "Hard times" our enterprizing citizens have no intention of "Laying on their oars," for several new buildings are to be erected this fall. Mr. Clark, tailor, has commenced the erection of a two story brick building to contain two shops. Other buildings are also projected.

Miss McNae, from the township of Artemesia, is visiting in Dunnalk this week.

Mr. D. Strachan, formerly of this place, is on a visit to his friends.

The junior minister of the Methodist church, Mr. E. Shaw, has met with a favorable reception.

The Presbyterians of this place are about to extend a call to a minister. It is to be hoped that they will be successful in this their third effort to secure a pastor.

The crops are assuming a more promising appearance since the late warm rains, and an average crop is expected.

Prominent among the greatest medical discoveries, by the many cures it has effected, McGregor's Speedy Cure leads the van. Subjected to the minutest chemical analysis, it has been found to contain none of those injurious ingredients characterizing the worthless specifics daily offered to the public. Every ingredient possesses a peculiar adaptability to the various complaints for which it has been compounded, and its efficacy is being established by testimonials hourly received. We are therefore confident that we have a preparation which we can offer to the public with the assurance that it will be found not only a relief but an absolute cure for Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Indigestion, Constipation and Impure Blood. Free trial bottles at Hill Bro's. A. & S. 4

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

Mr. M. P. McMaster, our popular teacher, returned home on Saturday evening last from an extended tour through Quebec and Newfoundland.

Our enterprising base ball club played a friendly game with the Eugenia club last week on the Eugenia grounds. Nine innings were played. Our boys played an easy game all the way through, and won by almost double. Who'll be the next.

On Saturday evening last the residence of J. W. Armstrong, Esq., of this village was the scene of a cheerful and happy gathering of young people of the village, being occasioned by the visit of the happy couple, Dr. Armstrong, formerly of this village, and Miss Lazier, of Bellville, just joined in wedlock. After the company of over fifty had assembled, and happy greetings had been exchanged and all had done justice to the good things provided, all joined heartily in charades and various games, music, etc., until the hour for separation had arrived, when all went home, feeling well pleased with the evening's entertainment. We wish the Dr. and his bride a pleasant and safe trip up the lakes to their destination.

KILLED BY DOGS.—Mr. Robt. Akitt, who lives a few miles east of this village, has had the misfortune to have a splendid flock of sheep, 55 in number, almost destroyed by dogs. Out of the whole number only ten sound sheep remain. A number that was not killed outright have been dying off from injuries received.

The following is from J. W. Pickering, of Winnipeg, formerly grain buyer for Wallace Gillesby, of Hamilton and Grimsby: "I was for many years much afflicted with Costiveness, Biliousness, and ultimately Dyspepsia. I suffered very much and tried many different medicines, which gave me only temporary relief and then I was as bad as ever again. I was recommended by a friend, who had been restored to health by it, to try McGregor's Speedy Cure. I did so, and it was not long before I felt like a new man, and I have enjoyed excellent health ever since. I first commenced taking it February 7th, 1884. Sold by Hill Bro's. A. & S. 4

His Uncle's Heir.

Frank lifted the small trembling hand that touched his arm reverently to his lips. How should he ever be grateful enough for, ever repay the loyal love that dared so much for his sake?

"Heaven bless you, my darling!" he whispered fervently, and then turned to her father, anticipating some terrible explosion of wrath, and fervently hoping that it would fall upon his head alone.

But none came. Mr. Verner stared blankly in the girl's face, then turned his head aside with a smothered groan.

"Oh, child, you break my heart!" he cried below his breath. "Go, Essie with your sister. I am not angry; I shall not quarrel—all that folly is forgotten; but I have some business with—some bad news for—Frank!"

"For me!" the young man broke in wonderingly, while Essie crept only the closer to him, and held her ground with that strange new courage that love had given.

"If there is bad news, I must help him to bear it," she said; and her soft eyes met her father's fearlessly.

"What is it, sir!" Frank asked, having run every possible and impossible calamity over in his mind and found none that could effect him very nearly. "No bank can break and ruin me, and I'm so nearly alone in the world that, all being well here, death can hardly touch me."

"Death!" Mr. Verner echoed the always terrible word with an emphasis that made it more ghastly than ever; his bloodshot eyes rested on the young man's face, as though they would pierce to his soul. "Death can harm every man—and you have—relatives, if not friends."

"Relatives and friends too, I hope," Frank broke in warmly; "but they are all well at De Walden Court."

"All!" the other repeated, with the same strange tone and look.

"Yes, all. At least, I left them so this morning." He paused, and grew very pale, suddenly recalling Anita de Walden's sorrowfully spoken words—"The shadow comes nearer and nearer, and it means harm to those I love, or to me."

Had that wild, dreamy terror been prophetic? Had harm come in any strange and terrible shape to the graceful girl wife or her gray haired lord? His heart throbbed with an unselfish dread as he said hurriedly—

"Oh, what is it? You speak of them, I know. Is my uncle—is Lady de Walden ill?"

There followed a brief pause—then Mr. Verner asked sternly—

"Is there no one else at de Walden Court?"

"The lad—little Georgie? Yes; but surely it is not he who——"

"Is dead? It is."

Frank stared at the speaker almost incredulously. It was so impossible to associate the grim and terrible idea of sudden death with the bright faced noble little lad who had trotted beside him through the De Walden meadows twenty-four short hours ago. He could still feel about his own the warm close clasp of the fat baby fingers, could hear the merry prattle of the baby-voice, and meet the frank glance of the baby eyes that were as clearly blue as the summer heavens. Something rose in his throat with the recalled remembrance, and almost choked him, while tears of which he was all unconscious rose thickly in his eyes.

"Little Georgie! Oh, it is horrible—it seems impossible!" he cried at last, while Essie cried softly at his side, partly in pity for the little lad who was but a name to her, partly in sympathy with her lover's pain.

"Horrible indeed!" Mr. Verner said with a strong shudder. "More horrible than death in its natural shape can ever be, for the child was murdered!"

Essie echoed the word with a shrill scream and May herself, trembling violently and very pale, drew instinctively nearer to her sister's side.

But Essie did not see her, or feel the touch of her cold hand; she had eyes and thoughts only for Frank, who seemed literally stunned by what he had heard, and stood staring stupidly before him. Lord Croxford was the only person sufficiently master of himself to take in the full terror of the situation, and venture a question now.

"Sir George de Walden's son is killed, you say?" he asked, turning his gold rimmed glasses keenly on Mr. Verner's face, and speaking in the slow sensible tones that seemed to introduce a reasonable element into the phantasmal horrors of some hideous dream. "Well, that's very terrible, of course! But, pardon me, why use so shocking a word as 'murder' here?"

May flashed one passionately grateful glance at the lover who was so little wont to shine with an independent lustre, and wondered what oratorical outburst could equal in effect that plain and pregnant speech.

But Mr. Verner, wiping the great drops of a mortal terror from his wrinkled forehead, shook his gray head despairingly as he answered the young man—

"Unfortunately, that is the only word to use. The poor child was found by his unfortunate mother this morning, strangled, and quite dead, with the little sash the nurse had tied on not an hour before tightly knotted round his throat."

A dead silence followed; even Lord Croxford drew back, turning faint and giddy, and May felt the room whirl round so wildly that she caught at the nearest table for support; but Essie clung to her lover still, though the face that grew paler and prouder every instant grew also more indistinct to her strained vision, and when he spoke his voice sounded faint and far away.

Yet it was clear and even stern; and he stood like a rock before the man who he knew accused him in his heart.

"And do they suspect—do they accuse any one of this foul crime?"

Mr. Verner held the chair before him with a tighter grip, and looked away from the proud agony of those keen eyes.

"They say that—that the child was last seen in your charge, that he stood in your way, and—and——"

"That I murdered him!" Frank finished almost calmly, as, exhausted by the terrible scene through which he had passed, the old man dropped heavily into a chair drawn up against the table and bowed his livid face on his outstretched arms. "Thank you, Mr. Verner; I know the worst now, and I can act!"

"Oh, Frank, poor Frank!" May cried between her passionate sobs. "What madness is this! What will you do?"

"Go back to De Walden Court and meet my accusers face to face!" Frank cried, his gray eyes flashing with a dangerous fire, his clear cut features seeming to harden with every word. "I harm that innocent baby! I——"

He paused abruptly and tried to loose the little fingers that had clasped with such piteous passion on his own. Essie had not fainted; she had simply lost the power of speech or movement. She could only cling to the man whom fate seemed wresting from her, and try to speak to him with the dumb agony of her eyes.

"Essie, my darling," he cried brokenly—for her pain was the hardest of all to bear—"let me go, Essie! Be brave for my sake, and help me now."

The white lips stirred, but no sound came from them; the eyes questioned, implored, protested an undying love and trust; and Frank could still take comfort from them.

"Take her, May," he said, with an appealing look; and May drew her sister away—"take her and keep her for me. I must go at once to De Walden Court."

"And I will go with you," said Lord Croxford quietly. It was his way of showing his unshaken faith in his friend, and he did it in his usual prosaic fashion; but to Frank and May Verner that way seemed the essence of chivalry, the one thing that could give them a gleam of comfort now.

"Yes, go, dear," the girl cried, with such eager grateful passion in her sweet voice and shining eyes as set the young man's pulses throbbing. "Go and bring Frank back to us, for Essie's sake, and mine."

CHAPTER VIII.

It was a terrible story that the next day's paper set forth, a terrible story that May Verner read by her unconscious sister's side; and, reading it, the brave and loving girl almost felt that her heart might break.

Mr. Verner's report had been substantially correct. Lady de Walden, following her husband's instructions, had instituted an instant search through the extensive grounds of De Walden Court. The servants, exploring in all directions, had found no trace of the missing child; but presently there had been heard scream upon scream issuing from the direction of the shrubbery, and all crowding there had found the unhappy mother clasping the murdered baby in her arms and frantically calling to Heaven to give her back her child.

They were stolid, unimpressionable folk who looked upon that scene of utter agony; but not one among them will forget it till his dying day. The baby figure had been so full of life and health an hour back, all rigid and dreadful now, the golden hair floating back from the blackened swollen face and wildly staring eyes, the girl mother in the tragic majesty of an agony that drove her really mad. They tried to take the little victim from her, for the burden was far beyond her strength; but she struck their hands fiercely away, and staggered back through the brilliant morning sunshine that gleamed on her bare golden head and blazing eyes and on the pitifully altered face that lay upon her breast.

"My lady, my lady, cry for Heaven's sake!" her maid had implored, kneeling at her feet, while the tears ran like rain down her own honest ruddy face; but Anita did not even seem to hear her or feel the scalding drops that fell upon her white hands.

She had placed poor little Georgie on her own bed, and sat beside him, never moving her hot eyes from the poor little face that the women could not look upon without a fresh burst of choking tears. She would not suffer any one to touch the child until Sir George came home. There was something appalling in the utter calm with which she kept her waiting watch; and by-and-by the women crept one by one away and left her alone with her dead.

And presently Sir George came in, his face gray with pain, the veins on his forehead swelling and standing out like knotted whip cord, his breath coming in great gasping sobs. He brushed past the pale and frightened servants who clustered together on the stairs and about the bed room door, and, going straight to the bed, gathered the pale little figure to his breast in a very agony of rage and pain.

"My boy, my Georgie!" he cried, his voice hoarse with agony, his strong frame shaken with the sobs that seemed to rend his massive chest. "My little murdered child!"

Even this did not move Anita. She heeded him apparently no more than she had heeded the servants as they came and went, the only difference being that she suffered him to touch the child. Her eyes still blazed with the same fierce lustre, her hands were still locked in a rigid clasp.

And for once Sir George had no thought, no word, no look, for her. She suffered, of course she did! Was not his very heart riven, his very soul on fire with a wild craving for revenge on the coward whose ruthless hand had taken that sweet child life?

Presently his voice rang out, a shrill harsh note that it had never known before mingling with its deeper tones and giving a strange passionate intensity to his words.

"And this is his work, his vengeance—the coward, the——"

"Whose work?"—the frozen calm was broken through at last. Anita sprang to her feet, and something, a realizing horror, a comprehension that had not been in them yet, seemed to leap suddenly into her shining eyes; her rigid lips unclosed, her breath came thick and fast.

"Whose work—oh, George, whose work?"

Sir George's gray face and tear reddened eyes were slowly raised.

"Who but the one man had cause to hate our darling—my nephew Frank de Walden."

"No, no!" Anita's hands were raised and passionately clasped above her head; her voice rose in a shrill scream that echoed through all the house of mourning like the cry of a lost spirit, and brought the servants pouring in pell mell. "Not he—not Frank! Oh, Heaven, no! He would not harm my darling! No; it was——"

She broke down there, with a strange, gurgling cry, flung out both arms, and fell forward upon her face. When they raised her, face, dress, and hands were deluged with blood. She had broken a large vessel on the lungs, and even the least experienced person there knew that her life was draining away.

And in truth she never recovered consciousness, never spoke again. The agony of a long lifetime had been condensed in to those few hours, and mind and body had alike broken down under the unnatural strain.

She lay for some hours, looking like some lovely monumental figure in her perfect beauty and perfect calm, slowly breathing her life away; and, before the evening shadows fell, Sir George was doubly bereaved. The mother and child so cruelly parted here had met again on the immortal shore.

The two young men had gone straight from Mr. Verner's house to the railway station; but only one of them had been suffered to reach De Walden Court, for Frank was arrested as he entered the train, and the man who had him in charge was naturally anxious to place a prisoner so important in immediate safe-keeping.

Lord Croxford grew very pale, and manifested an unexpectedly pugnacious disposition when he saw the significant gleam of steel in the detective's hand; but Frank restrained him with an imploring glance, and could only gnaw his blonde moustache, and feel savagely miserable and helpless.

"It must have come sooner or later," Frank said, as they parted. He was wonderfully calm and self possessed, though his eyes gleamed with a feverish brightness, and his handsome face was very pale. "But I wish—I wish I had seen Sir George. You will go to him, Croxford, and say how I grieve for my little cousin, for him, for——" He paused suddenly, with a blank face; then added slowly—"But how if he thinks me guilty?"

"Then he is a fool for his pains," Lord Croxford broke in, with all the roughness of genuine feeling. "You guilty, Frank! I would as soon believe in my own guilt.

Frank answered only by a grateful look; and the other went on hastily—

"Of course, I will act as your deputy, and bring my report to-morrow. Keep up your spirits, old fellow. These mad mistakes can never last long, you know; and—and Heaven bless you, and good-bye!"

And, with a warm hand clasp, the good hearted young Viscount hurried away, horribly ashamed of the tears that dimmed his glasses and were an honor to his manhood, if he had had but the sense to see it.

It was late when he arrived at De Walden Court; but only the faintest glimmer of light broke through the massive ivy-grown frontage of the great house. The vast entrance hall was all in shadow, and the kindly messenger, already sufficiently depressed felt his heart sink lower and lower as he stood in that gloomy ante-chamber, awaiting Sir George's permission to come in.

It was hard to get and long in coming, and only obtained at last by a desperate use of Frank de Walden's name. Lord Croxford winced to see how even the man who took his message and ushered him finally into Sir George's presence stared and colored angrily at the sound.

The great library, in which the stricken man sat, was as dark as all the rest of the house. Croxford could not see the bent shaking figure that raised itself from the great arm chair at his entrance, nor the fierce swollen eyes that turned angrily to his till his attention was drawn in that direction by the sound of a harsh querulous voice.

"Well, sir, you have thrust yourself upon my misery. What excuse have you to make?"

Lord Croxford was certainly not accustomed to such an unceremonious style of address; but he did not resent it now. He was not thinking of himself or his own dignity; his heart ached for this broken, desolate old man almost as much as for his injured friend.

"Forgive me, Sir George"—he spoke, after a little hesitating pause, with infinite gentleness and unfeigned sympathy. "Heaven knows I would not intrude upon your grief; but I come to tell you that Frank——"

"That they have taken him, that he is caught!" Sir George broke in, his voice trembling, his eyes ablaze with savage exultation. "Tell me that and I will thank and bless you, sir, as you were never thanked and blessed before."

Lord Croxford was silent. Not all his pity for the misery maddened man before him could keep the angry blood from his face, the angry sparkle from his eyes as he listened to that cruelly unjust speech, but, by a mighty effort, he did keep back all angry words; and his silence wrought the other to frenzy.

"Is that your news? Is Frank de Walden in safe custody?" he broke out violently striking his hand with cruel force upon the massive table; and his blood shot eyes shone with a cruel fire.

"Yes, that last injustice has been done the man you wrong so foully!" Lord Croxford answered, with a sort of bitter calm. "Frank has been arrested for a crime which it is simply monstrous to associate with his name. He is absolutely incapable of cruelty to any one, and he loved your child."

Sir George gave a cry that was like the roar of a wild beast in fiercest pain.

"Loved!" he echoed savagely, "the child who robbed him of his heritage, who stood between him and his promised wife! No; we were mad to trust the innocent creature in his power! We might have known what his resignation meant."

"You might have known your nephew," Lord Croxford said, with a restrained passion that was full of dignity. "I have known him as man and boy; and I know as surely as I know that the sun shines in the heaven, and you and I both live and breathe, that, whatever the evidence against him, Frank is innocent."

Even Sir George seemed momentarily impressed by the passionate conviction of the young man's speech. He stared stupidly into the shadows, then broke in with a harsh discordant laugh.

"Whatever the evidence!" he cried with a terribly mockery. "Your faith may be strong indeed if it survive that test! Do you know, sir, that your friend took the child out for a walk, a walk from which neither of them returned, for he went straight to London, and the boy—oh, Heaven, my little helpless Georgie!—was only brought home dead!"

His head sank forward upon his folded arms; even the anger died out of his voice, which became a mere wail of agony. For the second time that day Lord Croxford felt the tears rush blindingly to his eyes. He drew a little nearer to the stricken man, his kind heart aching with the burden of a painful pity. He felt so powerless to help or heal in the presence of this tragic woe. His faith in Frank was utterly unshaken; but the plain fierce words had shown him more clearly than ever the deadly peril in which his friend stood.

"Forgive me, Sir George," he said almost tenderly—and his voice, gentle as it was, was broken, and thrilled with the nervous agitation that possessed him—"for worlds I would not say one word to irritate or anger you; but, for truth's sake, I must answer you still. I do not know, I cannot guess, how the terrible chain that links Frank's name with this most hideous crime got itself forged; but I know that it is a chain of falsehood, that it can and shall be broken."

"Break it then!" the old man answered savagely. "You are a good friend and a strong advocate, sir; but I think you and your client will both find that chain a strong enough to hang him!"

Implacable hate gleamed in the swollen eyes, and sounded in the raspy hoarse voice. Lord Croxford felt that it was useless, for the present at least, to contend with one who was deaf alike to reason and appeal, though he felt, with added pang, how terrible this man's full conviction of his nephew's guilt would influence the public mind. He sighed involuntarily as he decided this; and the sound attracted Sir George's attention. He eyed the young man keenly, and, for the first time, made some faint attempt to speak with reasonable courtesy.

"I do not blame you, sir. Thinking as you do, you are right to stand by your friend in such a time as this. But when you know, as I know now, his shameful guilt——"

"Say rather when you know how great a wrong you have done him, you will be glad that he had a friend," Lord Croxford said hurriedly. "That day will come, Sir George; but we shall never see the one of which you speak. Till then, good-bye." He moved towards the door, then came back again, and spoke with a resolute effort. "One question more. I must tell all that has passed between us to Frank, and, Heaven knows, it will be a bitter task! I would gladly find one gleam of hope to give him. Does the poor mother, does Lady de Walden share your conviction of his guilt?"

Sir George stared, as though he hardly understood him at first; then the blood rushed hotly over the gray face, and the eyes emitted one vivid flash as he cried, with a cruel laugh—

"Yes, you can take some comfort to your friend—can tell him his cruel vengeance is complete—Lady de Walden is dead!"

CHAPTER IX.

"Frank!"—"My darling!"

It was a very worn and haggard face that bowed itself over Essie Verner's dark head. Confinement and watching and anxiety had stolen the healthy bronze from the clear skin and traced some sharp lines on the smooth brow—nay, even drawn some gleaming silver threads through the close crispness of the brown gold curls: but the eyes were still clear and steadfast, and the lips kept their brave sweet smile.

That smile, though she met it morning after morning when she and her sister paid their daily visits to the prisoner, fully committed for trial as Frank was now, was always a little more than May's nerves could stand; it always sent her to the grim uncurtained window that looked out upon the square paved prison-yard—there to rage fiercely and impotently against the cruel folly of a world that could mistake Frank de Walden for a murderer.

"And yet they will convict him!" the girl would cry from time to time, as the black and bitter waters of an utter despair surged over her struggling soul. "There are only those who know and love to trust him still, and it rests with the others to condemn."

It was strange to see the transformation wrought in the character of the sisters by this time of cruel trial. It was bright brave May, hitherto the guide and leader in all things, who broke down utterly now, who lost faith in the justice of man and the mercy of Heaven, who was hysterical and miserably weak in the presence of her morbid fears—gentle, timid, Essie who took up the burden laid upon her, and bore it bravely and patiently, who cheered her lover, father, and sister in the moments of darkest despondency, and tried to chase them growing terrors with the light of her own serene faith.

"Frank is innocent!" she would say, her blue eyes lighting with the fire that gave her worn young face a strangely spiritual look. "We know that; and we know that one truth and justice must prevail at last."

Whereat Mr. Verner would eye his favorite child with sorrowful amazement, and groan aloud in bitterness of heart. He no longer controverted the innocence, though his reason told him that the evidence brought forward in the case was overwhelmingly strong; some instinct stronger than reason waged war with it and bore it down. He could not think Frank de Walden a murderer—the cruel destroyer of an innocent helpless child.

But though he believed him guiltless, he believed also that he must die. There seemed no feeble link in that terrible circumstantial chain that wound itself about him, dragging him nearer and ever nearer to the scaffold. His death might be a judicial murder, but such had been perpetrated in Mr. Verner's memory, and might be again.

The doubts and terrors, the ague-fits of horror and remorse that broke down the stern strong man, making him permaturely old and feeble, seized from time to time on Croxford and May, paralysing the efforts of the true friend and loving sister, and making them almost shun the man they were powerless to save; but they never touched Essie: her clear eyes seemed to pierce the dark clouds about them and rest with tranquil assurance on the light beyond.

Physical superiority of the ante-Alexandrian Greeks to the hardiest and most robust nations of modern times, is perhaps best illustrated by the military statistics of Xenophon. According to the author of the "Anabasis," the complete accoutrements of the Spartan soldier, in what we would call heavy marching order, weighed seventy-five pounds, exclusive of the camp, mining, and bridge-building tools, and the rations of bread and dried fruit which were issued in weekly instalments and increased the burden of the infantry soldier to ninety, ninety-five, or even a full hundred pounds. This load was often carried at the rate of four miles an hour for twelve hours per diem, day after day; and only in the burning deserts of southern Syria the commander of the Grecian auxiliaries thought it prudent to shorten the usual length of a day's march.

There are three wicks to the lamp of man's life—brain, blood, and breath. Press the brain a little, its light goes out, followed by both the others. Stop the heart a minute, and out go all three of the wicks. Choke the air out of the lungs and presently the fluids cease to supply the other centres of flame, and all is seen stagnation, cold and darkness.

Comfort for Can't-Get-Away.

You can walk so comfortably in the [illegible] and have your choice of seats, as there will be no disagreeable crowd, and no dust [illegible] carriages.

You can study geography, and improve yourself so much, by engaging all your travelling friends to write to you to tell you what they are seeing, and you can [illegible] them—on the map.

You will feel so much more comfortable watching over your own premises, instead of leaving them to servants, who will [illegible] in followers, and perhaps set the house on fire.

You will avoid those long, cold, dull evenings in the country, and especially at the seaside, when you are tired out, and get a book, and are ashamed to have a [illegible] and you can spend them in the comfort of your own house.

You can fetch up such a deal of reading which you have never had time to master during the season, and besides, can [illegible] ly set yourself to Spencer, Tyndall and other really instructive writers.

You can see a great deal of your poor unpresentable relations, and ask them to tea, and advise them as to the bringing up of their children, and otherwise discharge the duties of consanguinity.

And you cannot think how much more you will enjoy a country holiday in 1884 if you omit taking one in 1883; besides when your friends return to town, you will have so much more leisure to listen to their narratives of travel, having none to bore them with in return.

A gang of Italian laborers near Saratoga were recently cut down ten cents a day. Instead of striking, they cut an inch off their shovel blades at night. The boss asked what it meant, and one of the men replied, "Not so much pay, not so much dirt; all right, job last the more long. Italian fool like Irishman; he no strike."

Men Ignorant of Fire.

I do not know of any but a single race where natives of a newly discovered country did not know the use of fire: that one race was on Island Fanua Loa, or Bodwitch's Island, discovered on the 29th of January, 1841, by W. H. Hudson, of the United States South Sea Surveying and Exploring Expedition.

Capt. Hudson relates: "The natives were at first very shy of the boats; but the Hawaiians who were in them soon induced them to approach, and to enter into trade, and finally enticed them alongside the ship. On coming near they began a song or chant, holding up their paddles and mats, and shouting 'kafilou tamatau.' They resembled the natives of Oatafu, or Duke of York's Island, wore the same kind of mats, of the shades and ornaments, and some were tattooed in the same manner. Some, however, were tatooed in a different style, being ornamented with a variety of arrows on the forehead and cheeks. They were all finely formed and manly in appearance, with pleasing countenances that expressed good nature.

"They were eager enough for trade, and soon disposed of all they had to exchange; few presents were made them, but all their inducements failed to entice them on board. They appeared cheerful, laughing heartily at anything that struck them as ridiculous.

"The population of the island is estimated to be about six hundred souls, most of whom dwell in the town.

"There was no signs of places for cooking nor any appearance of fire, and it is believed that all their provisions are eaten raw. What strengthened this opinion was the alarm the natives felt when they saw the sparks emanating from the flint and steel and the emission of smoke from the mouths of those who were smoking cigars."

The writer of this article was on board the Peacock, and can vouch for the veracity of Capt. Hudson's account of our intercourse with the natives, and also that they eat their entire food without cooking, but she had the greatest dread of fire in any form. We saw no traces of charcoal or ashes in their village or town, and we fully understood them as to their food and how it was taken. It consisted entirely of cocoanuts and pandanus fruits; fish, echini, and other products of the sea; the few birds must be seen there, were not regarded as food, not even if they were, could not have been easily obtained or relied on for supplies, the population being large in proportion to its land's size.

A Cheap Beehive.

E. L. Conger of Maple Creek has a cheap hive of swarms of bees which came into his possession under peculiar circumstances. About two years ago, late in the fall, a swarm came to his place, taking refuge between the siding and wall of a little addition to his house, going in through a knot hole in the siding. Coming so late in the season they were unable to lay up enough honey to keep them, and they all died during the winter. The next week Monday, about noon, another bee swarm came in exactly the same way, and a few hours later another and larger swarm followed suit, all going in though the same knot hole and making themselves at home in the space between the walls and the studding. The last swarm would comprise about a half bushel. They are now busily at work preparing to settle down for a permanent residence. The instinct of bees is remarkable, but this is one of the strangest cases we have heard of for a long time.

Fish-Eating Plants.

Prof. Baird, of the National Museum, has received from England a specimen of an aquatic fish-eating plant, known as the great bladderwort, which has been discovered to be peculiarly destructive to young fish. The plant is large, has no roots, but floats free in the water, and its leaves have small bladders which entrap the fish. Twelve or fifteen species of the plant are found within the limits of the United States, and it abounds in the Fish Commission carp ponds in Washington, where it has been introduced at considerable labor and expense, having been heretofore regarded as excellent fish food. Prof. Baird warn carpiculturists to destroy the plant wherever found, as he believes that millions of fry must be annually caught in the little bladder traps.

What The Hand Can Tell.

Within the past few months there has been a great revival of interest in Palmistry, or the art of telling fortunes and character by the lines and marks of the hand. This is a decidedly amusing way of passing a rainy and entertaining a small party, and a slight explanation of the subject may be of interest.

The Greek palmists divided the palm into different sections, and named these locations in honor of their principal deities. Thus The Mount of Venus occupies the base of the thumb, bounded by the vital line. When large shows strong and enduring physical powers. The fullness indicates muscular development—strength—in men, and beauty in women. The fine quality of the mount shows grace in movement, love of melody, desire to please, love of pleasure, luxury, loving or dissipation, as other signs indicate. Firmness here shows endurance; while softness shows a love of ease; lines here parallel to the vital line are favorable, while cross lines are undesirable. The Mount of Jupiter is found in the upper part of the palm, below the first finger. This is the finger that points, rules, directs or aspires. The Mount of Jupiter favorably indicates ideality, ambition, pride, self-respect, aspiration. It ill shows arrogance, vanity, tyranny, egotism, boastfulness. Weak or flat, shows a mind void of imagination, a plodder, routine worker, a phlegmatic or irritable disposition.

The Mount of Saturn, found below the middle finger, when full, indicates reality, seriousness, prudence, determination. The mount smooth shows tranquillity, hope and industry. In excess we look for unscrupulousness, bigotry, asceticism. Weak or flat suggests carelessness, easy-going, thriftless, aimlessness. This mount is most favorable as it is clear or traversed by sending lines, and unfavorable as it is crossed by cross lines or especially crooked lines which show melancholy, brooding and foreboding.

The Mount of Apollo, also known as the Mount of the Sun, is located under the ring third, finger. This mount full and favorable indicates taste and ability in the arts, tendency to vividly express the imagination; hence literature, painting, music, in short, it gives expression in material form to the indications of Jupiter. Too full suggests fanaticism, envy, dishonor. One ascending line shows concentration, success; several lines, versatility.

The Mount of Mercury, below the little finger, when favorable, shows ability to express and to communicate; hence, eloquence, conversational powers, pleasing manners, diplomacy, deftness in action, charm of personal presence. In excess, when it is generally marked with unfavorable lines, it suggests pretension, deception, chicanery, dishonesty.

The Mount of Mars is in the outer part of the palm, before the Mount of Mercury. As it is full and favorable, it shows courage, aggressive self-reliance, fearlessness. The plain of Mars, or hollow of the hand, full and clear, shows the same qualities, only in the way of endurance instead of aggression or excess, foolhardiness and violence, and weak cowardice is suggested.

The Mount of the Moon is in the lower part of the palm, opposite the Mount of Venus. This mount, full and clear, shows fancy, reverie, meditation, love of quiet, solitude. In excess, there is suggested cant, superstition, fanaticism. Lines on this mount show changeable motives, and curved lines a love of travel.

The lines of the palm play an important part in all symptoms of hand reading.

The vital line rises at the edge of the palm, between the thumb and the forefinger, incloses the Mount of Venus and terminates at or near the wrist. This line, as its name suggests, indexes the person's vitality, health, energy, recuperative power. It is said to become extent the record of past severe illness, and, therefore, a basis for a calculation of future health.

This line favorably announces vitality, energy and health, and consequently suggests long life. This line slender or dim shows low condition of vitality, ill health, weakness. This line splintered out, broken or ragged, shows painful, irritating or debilitating diseases. Cut by many other cross lines suggests headaches or nervous troubles. Short branches ascending from this line are favorable; descending branches are unfavorable, showing depleting ailments. All lesser lines parallel to the vital line are favorable. Short lines cutting the vital line, or lines parallel to it, are unfavorable.

The thought line begins at or near the vital line, and traverses the Plain of Mars toward the Mount of Mars, sometimes reaching the latter, sometimes curving down on the Mount of the Moon. The thought line, united with the vital line, shows a union of plan and performance, a practical mind in life. As it continues straight it suggests good memory, direct purpose; as it courses up it shows one whose thoughts are ruled by the emotions; as it curves down into the Mount of the Moon imagination is shown. Separated from the vital line at the beginning shows one who will purpose one thing and perform another—one better or worse or both better and worse than usually considered. Breaks in this line, especially when they are ragged, or spots upon it, show mental troubles.

The impulse line begins at the edge of the palm below the Mount of Mercury, traverses the palm between the thought line and the vital lines, usually terminating near, at or upon the Mount of Jupiter, sometimes entirely reaching the latter.

This line to the ideal should be full, clear and smooth, gracefully curved and branching upon the Mount of Jupiter in two or three nearly equal branches. This line in this form shows warm emotions, loving friendship, ardent, persistent affection, noble self-denial. If it passes over further to the edge of the palm it indexes violent emotions, general happiness in love and labor, intense misery in thwarted sentiments or purposes.

When this line terminates before reaching the Mount of Jupiter it indicates less ardent affection and of a grosser quality.

If the impulse line unite with the thought line under the Mount of Jupiter, it shows a mind of very unequal character, who is "cool, calculating and cruel," or ardent, impulsive and emotional by turns. If the two lines run throughout, these signs are intensified, and also the case if the thumb is small, the nails pointed or the skin sensitive.

Spots, cuts, imperfections in this line are indications of the involuntary nerve force. The line bare of branches shows suppression of the aspirations and affections. This line chained, ragged, made up

What The Hand Can Tell.

Within the past few months there has been a great revival of interest in Palmistry, or the art of telling fortunes and character by the lines and marks of the hands. It is a decidedly amusing way of passing an evening and entertaining a small party, and a slight explanation of the subject may be of interest.

The Greek palmists divided the palm into different sections, and named these localities in honor of their principal deities.

The Mount of Venus occupies the base of the thumb, bounded by the vital line. Venus when shows strong and enduring physical nerve. The fullness indicates muscular development—strength—in men, and beauty in women. The fine quality of the mount shows grace in movement, love of melody, desire to please, love of pleasure, luxurious living or dissipation, as other signs may harmonize. Firmness here shows endurance; while softness shows a love of ease. Lines here parallel to the vital line are favorable, while cross lines are undesirable.

The Mount of Jupiter is found in the upper part of the palm, below the first finger. This is the finger that points, mentions, directs or aspires. The Mount of Jupiter favorably indicates ideality, ambition, pride, self-respect, aspiration. Too full shows arrogance, vanity, tyranny, fanaticism, boastfulness. Weak or flat, shows a mind void of imagination, a plodder, a routine worker, a phlegmatic or irritable temperament.

The Mount of Saturn, found below the middle finger, when full, indicates realism, seriousness, prudence, determination. This mount smooth shows tranquillity, hope and industry. In excess we look for unscrupulousness, bigotry, asceticism. Weak or flat suggests carelessness, easy-going, thriftlessness, aimlessness. This mount is more favorable as it is clear or traversed by ascending lines, and unfavorable as it is cut by cross lines or especially crooked lines, which show melancholy, brooding and foreboding.

The Mount of Apollo, also known as the Mount of the Sun, is located under the ring, or third, finger. This mount full and favorable indicates taste and ability in the arts, tendency to vividly express the imagination; hence literature, painting, music, invention; in short, it gives expression in material form to the indications of Jupiter. Too full suggests fanaticism, envy, dishonor. One ascending line shows concentration; chance, success; several lines, versatility.

The Mount of Mercury, below the little finger, when favorable, shows ability to express and to communicate; hence, eloquence, conversational powers, pleasing manners, diplomacy, deftness in action, charm of personal presence. In excess, when it is generally marked with unfavorable lines, it suggests pretension, deception, chicanery, dishonesty.

The Mount of Mars is in the outer part of the palm, before the Mount of Mercury. As it is full and favorable, it shows courage, aggressive self-reliance, fearlessness. The plain of Mars, or hollow of the hand, full and clear, shows the same qualities, only in the way of endurance instead of aggression In excess, foolhardiness and violence, and weak cowardice is suggested.

The Mount of the Moon is in the lower part of the palm, opposite the Mount of Venus. This mount, full and clear, shows fancy, reverie, meditation, love of quiet, solitude. In excess, there is suggested capacity, superstition, fanaticism. Lines on this mount show changeable motives, and curved lines a love of travel.

The lines of the palm play an important part in all symptoms of hand reading.

The vital line rises at the edge of the palm, between the thumb and the forefinger, incloses the Mount of Venus and terminates usually near the wrist. This line, as its name suggests, indexes the person's vitality, health, energy, recuperative power. It is to some extent the record of past severe illness, and, therefore, a basis for a calculation of future health.

This line favorably announces vitality, energy and health, and consequently suggests long life. This line slender or dim shows low condition of vitality, ill health, weakness. This line splintered out, broken or jagged, shows painful, irritating or debilitating diseases. Cut by many other crosses suggests headaches or nervous troubles. The branches ascending from this line are favorable; descending branches are unfavorable, showing depleting ailments. All lesser lines parallel to the vital line are favorable. Lines cutting the vital line, or lines parallel to it, are unfavorable.

The thought line begins at or near the vital line, and traverses the Plain of Mars toward the Mount of Mars, sometimes touching the latter, sometimes curving down toward the Mount of the Moon. The thought line, united with the vital line, shows a union of plan and performance, a practical trait in life. As it continues straight it suggests good memory, direct purpose; as it courses up it shows one whose thoughts are ruled by the emotions; as it curves down toward the Mount of the Moon imagination is active. Separated from the vital line at the beginning shows one who will purpose one thing and perform another—one better or worse or both better and worse than usually considered. Breaks in this line, especially if they are ragged, or spots upon it, show mental troubles.

The impulse line begins at the edge of the palm below the Mount of Mercury, traverses the palm between the thought line and the heart, usually terminating near, at or upon the Mount of Jupiter, sometimes entirely crossing the latter.

This line to the ideal should be full, clear and smooth, gracefully curved and branch-ending upon the Mount of Jupiter in two or three nearly equal branches. This line in this form shows warm emotions, strong friendship, ardent, persistent affection, noble self-denial. If it passes over further to the edge of the palm it indexes excitement emotions, general happiness in work and labor, intense misery in thwarted sentiments or purposes.

When this line terminates before reaching the Mount of Jupiter it indicates less ardent affection and of a grosser quality.

If the impulse line unite with the thought line under the Mount of Jupiter, it shows a mixed very unequal character, who is "cool, calculating and cruel," or ardent, impulsive and fanatical by turns. If the two lines run throughout, these signs are intensified.

This is also the case if the thumb is small, the nails pointed or the skin sensitive.

Marks, cuts, imperfections in this line indicate ailments of the involuntary nerve action. The line bare of branches shows a limitation of the aspirations and affections. This line chained, ragged, made up of smaller strands—overlapping instead of continuous—suggests instability of the affections, coquetry, flirtation, as other indications support or modify.

One without this line will never make a suitable marriage.

The material line may originate in almost any part of the base of the palm, and its general course is toward the Mount of Saturn, near which or upon which it usually ends. The ideally good material line rises near the wrist, upon or adjacent to the vital line, pursues a direct course, closing in a single, double or triple gracefully diminishing termination upon the highest part of the Mount of Saturn. Such a line tells of an industrious, practical, even purposed individual, who, through continuity or well directed effort, is sure to win success in a material way. As it rises near or upon the Mount of Venus, a passionate purpose is shown. As it rises near or upon the Mount of the Moon, visionary schemes of new enterprises are indexed. The line cutting through the Mount of Saturn to the middle finger shows a dogged tenacity of purpose—stubborn adhesiveness.

This line lacking indexes one with little material bias or executive ability.

The art line may rise anywhere in the lower part of the hand, and proceeds thence to the Mount of Apollo, under the third finger. This line favorable indicates a love of beauty. It will suggest the one who appreciates art, the art critic, the sculptor, painter, musician, inventor of industrial appliances, the superior artisan—as the other characteristics may determine.

Rising on the Mount of Venus, it suggests the pleasure-seeker; on the vital line, a material inclination; on the Mount of the Moon, fanciful ideas or graceful accomplishments. As its termination is swayed toward Mercury it shows personal persuasiveness; toward Saturn, an artistic use of the qualities of Saturn.

The assimilation line rises on the Mount of the Moon, or in the vital line, and proceeds toward the Mount of Mercury. This line tells of good powers of assimilation, humor, wit, hopeful views of life, hence a favorite in society. This line winding or tortuous suggests ailments; hence a melancholy temperament. This line broken, or making angular turns, tells of indigestions or dyspeptic troubles; hence it suggests irritability. The line red shows violence; pale, little power of assimilation. This line is often lacking, and its want is much more favorable than a poor line.

These rules are undoubtedly the ones followed by the gypsies in making their weird forecasts and prophecies. They are certainly ingenious and fantastic, and one almost wishes that there was some truth underlying the entertaining fiction.

A MODERN MAZEPPA.

The Terrible Ride of a Young Lothario on a Bronco.

M. Boussand, a wealthy cattle owner whose herds range in the unorganized territory of North-Western Nebraska, has just returned from the annual "round up" in that region and relates a tale of the plains that is, in some respects, a counterpart of the orthodox Mazeppa. When Boussand reached his ranch about the middle of June, he found his cowboys nursing a young man, whom they had rescued from the back of a bronco. When discovered, the modern Mazeppa was lashed to the horse, entirely naked and unconscious. The animal was about broken down, as if from long running, and was easily lassoed by the cowboys, who cut the thongs and released the strange captive. This happened about two weeks before Boussand's arrival, and during all that time the stranger had lain in a stupor. A few days before Boussand started on his return journey to Omaha, having a little medical knowledge, he succeeded in restoring the patient to consciousness, and his recovery was rapid.

When able to talk he said his name was Henry Burbank; that he was an Englishman, thirty-four years of age. About three years ago at Falmouth, England, he formed a partnership with a friend, Thomas Wilson, some years his senior, and with him came to America to embark in the cattle business. They cast about for a while and finally settled in Northwestern Nebraska, where the range was unlimited and herders few and far apart. They built a comfortable ranch by a little stream, where Wilson's young wife reigned as housekeeper, attended by two or three female domestics. Burbank, who was a handsome young fellow, found it agreeable, while Wilson was absent about the range, to make love to the latter's wife. This continued for some months, until in the latter part of May one of the cowboys, who had a grievance against Burbank, reported the fact to the woman's husband, whose jealousy had already been aroused.

That night Burbank was captured while asleep in bed by Wilson and three of his men and bound before he had a chance to make any resistance. Wilson had him stripped of every bit of clothing and bound on the back of a wild bronco, which was started off by a vigorous lashing. Before morning Burbank became unconscious and was therefore unable to tell about his terrible trip. He thinks that the outrage was committed on the night of May 27th, and he was rescued on the morning of June 3rd, which would make seven days he had been travelling about the plains on the horse's back without food or drink, and exposed to the sun and wind. Wilson's ranch is about two hundred miles from the spot where Burbank was found, and it is hardly probable that the bronco took a direct course, and therefore must have covered many more miles in his wild journey.

When fully restored to health, Burbank proposes to make a visit of retaliation on Wilson, and in this he will be backed by Boussand's men and those of the Ogallala Land & Cattle Company, whose ranch is near Boussand's.

Origin of Some Curious Sayings.

"Not worth a rap." The want of small money in Ireland had grown to such a height in 1721 2 that counterfeit coins called raps were in common use, made of such bad metal that what passed for a halfpenny was not worth a farthing. Hence the cant phrase, "Not worth a rap." The name in all probability, is derived from rappen, a small Swiss coin, value about half a farthing.

"Walk your chalks." A very simple explanation of this expression may be given English ale-house frequenters, when they have been drinking long enough to make a boast of being sober, and to dispute a point with each other, will chalk a long line on the ground and then endeavor one after the other to walk upon it without swerving to right or left. Those who succeed are adjudged to be sober—i. e., to have "walked their chalks."

"Cooking your goose." According to Notes and Queries "cooking your goose" is thus explained: "The King of Sweden's Goose—The King of Sweden, coming to a town of his enemy's, with very little company, his enemy, to slight his forces, did hang out a goose for him to shoote; but perceiving before night that these few soldiers had invaded and set their chiefe houlds on fire, they demanded of him what his intent was. To whom he replied: 'To roast your goose!'"

"Scot free." Scot, according to Cowel (Law Dictionary), signifies a certain custom or tollage. The right of voting in the boroughs in England was formerly in those who paid scot and lot. "Scot-free," therefore, is free from such custom or tollage.

"Strain at a gnat." The Moorish soldier when he drinks unfolds the end of his turban and places it over the mouth of his bota, drinking through the muslin to strain out the gnats, whose larvæ swarm in the water of that country

"I'll go through fire and water to serve you." The Bishops of Rochester possessed the manor of Southfleet, in Kent, before the conquest, and, as not unusual in ancient times, had a power of trying and executing felons. The jurisdiction extended not only to acts of felony done in the village, but also over criminals apprehended in another country. An instance of this kind in the year 1200 is mentioned by T. Blount in his "Ancient Tenures." It was of two women who had stolen some clothes in Croindene (supposed to be Croydon), and the men of that place, having pursued them to Southfleet, they were imprisoned and tried by the Lord Henry de Cobham, and other discreet men of the country, who adjudged them to undergo the fire ordeal, or examination of the hot iron. By this foolish test one of them was exculpated and the other condemned. The two chief species of trial by ordeal were those of fire and water. Both these modes might be performed by deputy; but the principal was to answer for the success of the trial, the deputy only venturing some corporeal pain for hire, or, perhaps, for friendship. "This" says Blackstone, "is still expressed in that common form of speech of going through fire and water to serve another." Hale tells us "In the time of King John, the purgation per ignem et aquam, or the trial by ordeal continued; but it ended with this king."

"By Hook or by Crook." The destruction by the fire of London in 1666, during which some 13,800 houses, etc., were burnt down, in very many cases obliterated all the boundary marks requisite to determine the extent of land, and the sites occupied by buildings previous to the fire. When the rubbish was removed disputes arose among persons as to the position and extent of their property, which promised not only interminable lawsuits, but created the serious evil of delaying the building of the city until these disputes were settled. Impelled by the necessity of coming to a more speedy settlement, it was determined that the claims and interests of all persons concerned should be referred to the judgment and decision of two of the most experienced land surveyors of that day, and in order to escape from the evils which delay must occasion, the decision of these two arbitrators were to be final and binding. The surveyors appointed were named Mr. Hook and Mr. Crook. Hence arose the saying above quoted.

"He's a brick." Plutarch, in his life of Agesilaus, King of Sparta, gives us the origin of the quaint and familiar saying. On a certain occasion an ambassador from Epirus, on a diplomatic mission, was shown by the King over his capital. The ambassador knew of the monarch's fame—knew that though only nominally King of Sparta, he was ruler of Greece—and he looked to see massive walls rearing aloft their embattled towers for the defense of the town; but found nothing of the kind. He marvelled much at this, and spoke of it to the king.

"Sire," he said, "I have visited most of the principal towns, and I find no walls reared for defense. Why is this?"

"Indeed, Sir Ambassador, replied Agesilaus, "thou canst not have looked carefully. Come with me to-morrow morning and I will show you the walls of Sparta."

Accordingly, on the following morning, the King led his guest out upon the plain where his army was drawn up in full battle array, and pointing proudly to the serried hosts, he said:

"There thou beholdest the walls of Sparta—10 000 men, and every man a brick!"

"Q. in a corner." This is an expression denoting something not noticed at first, but seen afterwards; something partially hidden, as it were, in an out-of-the-way place or corner. In French law "queue" is the thong by which seals are fastened to legal documents. The seals are fastened in the corner of the document.

"Glorious" War.

Joaquin Miller is a terrifying iconoclast. He says in the Philadelphia Press that the ancient saying that it is sweet to die for one's country is a pagan lie. His first point is that it is not sweet to die at all. His next, that from personal observation on a dozen battle fields he knows that dying soldiers think and talk of wife, mother and babes, not of country, in the hour of death. But is not the grasping at the grass and other objects, showing that the last desire is to cling to this earth, but a manifestation of the instinct of self-preservation, which overpowers the noblest sentiments? Sometimes soldiers, Miller says, with their last breath, will curse the rulers and men that brought them to such a barbarous, dog-like death. The great epic yet to be written is one that will amply depict the horrible, ghastly, beastly barbarism of war.

AGRICULTURAL.

Science and Farming.

The greatest obstacle in the way of man's improvement and the most difficult to overcome, has been ignorance. Placed here at the beginning with no experience, and totally without knowledge of the laws which governed nature in the growth, perfection and decay of vegetable and animal life—in fact, totally ignorant of the laws which govern his own existence, he was like a man in the dark; he groped about, stumbling and falling many times before he learned the roads that were safe and practicable. To-day, even with all our advancement, the "don't know" of our farmers alone, costs the country much more than would support all the educational institutions in existence. Knowledge adds so much to the power and efficiency of its possessor, and elevates him so much, that ignorance is always jealous and suspicious of it, and of its possessor, and for this reason there is always a prejudice in the common mind against so-called science, and especially is this the case among farmers. Not very long since, to call a man a scientific farmer, was at once to make him the butt of all the jokes of the neighborhood, and to set all eyes watching, in hopes he might make some failure. This is a grave mistake, for there is no one more dependent for success upon science and scientific practices, than the tiller of the soil.

Nature has certain fixed and immutable laws that regulate and control all her operations, as well as the growth and development of the tiniest seed into the living plant, and this to its full maturity and the production again of its seed, as of the creation and movements of the planetary system. Would the farmer achieve the greatest success, he must work in unison with, not antagonistic to these laws. The study and investigation of these laws as they relate to agriculture, and the application of the knowledge so obtained to its practical operations, in science, and that is all there is of scientific farming. We can see anything in this that should frighten or antagonize the farmer; but, on the contrary, it is the greatest incentive for him to become a student of the science of agriculture, and of all science that in any way relates to it.

For the sake of convenience, we talk about the science of chemistry, botany, etc.; but these are only names of different branches of science, and these are each and all useful to the farmer in many ways, in which they enable him to better know Nature's laws. For instance, chemistry seeks to know the cause of things by tearing down or pulling apart; if a field fails to produce a satisfactory crop of wheat, chemistry would take the soil and pull it apart by analysis, to ascertain what it contains; it takes the wheat plant, and pulling leaf, stem and grain apart, it ascertains of what each is composed. In other words, it asks the wheat what it needs and must have in order to produce the best crops. It asks the soil what it has in its storehouse and within the reach of the growing plant, which it will contribute to its use, and by comparing their answers, it is enabled to tell the farmers what the wheat plant must have, what the soil will contribute, and what he must supply, in order to grow crops that shall be remunerative. We follow these instructions and carefully watch results, and when the results corroborate the teachings of chemistry, we call an agricultural fact, and carefully record it, and records of all these facts form our text books, and are the admitted laws of science. Through our imperfect knowledge and methods, we sometimes mistake these teachings, and guess at the results, and call a fact established, and in our haste proclaim it as scientific principle, when it is only guess-work, thus bringing ridicule and dispute upon science, when the error is chargeable only to our ignorance, as, for instance, the theory once universally taught that the earth was the stationary centre of the universe. Increasing knowledge showed this not to be true, neither was it scientific, but only a blunder of ignorance. Science is knowledge; the correct interpretation of Nature's laws; and, of course, it is always true, reasonable, fixed, immutable. It is only our ignorance that causes us to mistake its teachings, or which prevent us from correctly translating its language.

The same power, based on the same scientific principle, was hidden in the union of heat and water, since the foundation of the universe; but man went on in ignorance unassisted by this mighty power, until Watt complied with the scientific law which enabled him to apply and control this power in the construction of the steam engine. The same laws govern the development and improvement of plants and animals, have always existed, and yet it is only very recently that man has understood and taken advantage of them, and we already see wonderful results. Surely any one so dependent on Nature's laws for his complete success as the farmer, cannot afford to be ignorant of them, and the more perfectly he understands and complies with them, the greater will be his success.

We may call it gumption, shrewdness luck, or by any other name, the success of the successful farmer is attained by a compliance with the scientific principles of agriculture, and by this means only, and the better these are understood, and the more closely they are followed, the greater will be his success. Then we say, that if these can be more quickly and perfectly learned from the text books than from long and costly experience, by all means study the books. Science and farming go well together, and we cannot well have too much of true science in our farming.

Growing the Egg-Plant.

The egg-plant is among the most desirable of our garden products, and should be found in every garden. The first week in June is the safest time to set out the plants from the hot-bed, and even they should be protected at night by covering with old newspapers, with clods on the corners; for it must be remembered that it is a very sensitive plant, and the least frost or even chilling nights will check its growth, from which it will take two or three weeks to recover. The plant requires a very rich soil: it should be firmly and rather deeply set in the ground and should be mulched with well-rotted manure. A row of these plants should receive as much, or really more attention than a row of celery. They should be watered daily with strong manure water for two or three weeks, and in very dry times the earth should be carefully drawn from the plants, plentifully watered, and then be returned again, hilling up slightly. The potato beetle is very fond of the leaves, preferring them to those of the potato; but as this pest has nearly disappeared, there is no much danger to be apprehended from it, though it is well to look out for it. The roots of the egg-plant take up very little room, making the necessity of strong manuring all-important. A row of from six to twelve plants is all sufficient for a family.—Germantown Telegraph.

Thinning Fruit.

Dr. Jabez Fisher, of Northern Massachusetts, tells Mr. Atkinson, editor of the Farm Journal, that the operation of thinning fruit should be commenced when the fruits are from one-half inch to an inch in diameter. Begin by removing so as to leave, 1st, no two specimens growing from the same spur, and no two so near together as they will be likely to touch each other when full grown, leaving, in all cases, the best one of a cluster; 2d, no specimen that is deformed or is so injured in any way that it will be sure to become deformed as it grows; 3rd, no one that shows injury by any insect; and 4th, no one that is materially smaller than the average of the remainder. Doctor Fisher has been remarkably successful. He has practiced thinning fruit for many years. But will this pay? To answer this question, it is first to be considered what it costs. Suppose a Beurre d'Anjou pear tree, the spherical head of which measures from twelve to thirteen feet in diameter and occupies say 1,000 cubic feet of space, to a set crop of 4,000 pears. If all were left to mature, they would measure, possibly, fifteen bushels, that might sell for $2 per bushel, or $30. If now the crop be thinned to one half its number, the product would be likely to measure eleven bushels that would be worth fully twice the price of the others, or $44. If the crop should comprise but 1,500 specimens, giving about ten cubic inches of space to each, the product would still be ten bushels, full worth $5, or $50 for the whole.

The Increase of Population.

"Is the increase of population to be dreaded?" is a question that, in one form or another, has engaged the attention of many. All discussion of the subject has been based on the assumption that the world's capacity for the production of human food is limited by the possibilities of agriculture. For writers on political economy have taken no account of fish as food, or, if they have considered fish at all, it has been upon the assumption that the supply of fish food is relatively insignificant, and must always remain so. But within a score of years the progress made in the artificial propagation of fish has revealed possibilities of food supply that are practically illimitable. Vast areas of fresh water hitherto unprotective, can by means of fish culture be made to yield an abundance of the very best of human food. And inland fisheries, prosecuted for ages, can by pisciculture be made a hundredfold more productive. Then, when the inland waters shall have been taxed to their utmost in the production of fish, there remains the ocean, boundless, illimitable, inexhaustible. The artificial propagation of fish is not confined to fresh water. It has been proved that the waters of the sea can be artificially restocked with fish as well as the waters of inland lakes and streams. For several years past a steamer in the service of the United States Government has been engaged in the artificial propagation of salt water fish and in their distribution in the depths of the seas frequented by the fishing vessels of New England. The most gratifying results have followed the work, and the successful propagation of deep sea fish is no longer to be regarded as a matter of doubt or experiment. Recent writers upon fish culture have shown that an acre of water can be more productive of food than an acre of land. Now when we further consider that more than three-quarters of our globe is covered by water, it becomes evident, that in ignoring the possibilities of the fish supply, the philosophers who have feared ultimate famine for humanity have left out of their reckoning an element whose importance can hardly be overestimated. We venture to say that considering the possibilities of fish production, in addition to the resources of agriculture, no one need fear that the coming generations will be in any immediate danger of starvation.

"THE EARTH IS THE LORD'S."

But a Massachusetts Crank Deeds Him Only a Piece of It.

A curious document has been recorded in the Worcester County Registry of Deeds in Worcester, Mass. It is a deed of one-half acre of land in Ashburnham, Mass., with buildings. It states that "I, Charles Hastings, of Ashburnham, gentleman, in consideration of the love and good will of the Lord Jesus and one cent found on the premises of His, the rightful owner of all lands, as recorded in the first book of laws, the Bible, fiftieth psalm of King David, 9th, 10th, 11th and 12th, and 23rd and 24th verses, the receipt whereof I do hereby acknowledge, do hereby give, grant and convey unto the Lord Jesus, the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, a portion of the late Col. Joseph Jewett's land," etc. This instrument goes to say that "The said property is given in trust, reserving, however, the right to occupy and improve, make repairs, pay taxes, insurance policies, etc., in fact, retain it under my control as agent, and making all proper reservations for myself and others during my natural life, the two southwest chambers and one of the storerooms below to be kept for historical rooms for relics of various kinds, and not to be let, such as belonged to Susan W. Hastings and others; that nothing is to be sold, neither real nor personal property, forever, but kept in trust for a memorial by those who have full faith in the blessed Lord Jesus, and to continue by His approbation forever to occupy according to His will." This instrument was duly "signed, sealed and delivered" in the presence of three witnesses, acknowledged before a Justice of the Peace in in Ashburnham, and accompanied by the legal fees for its recording.

Watering-place boarding houses are said to be filling up. That is more than their boarders will be able to do.

A western college refused to establish a department of wood-carving, for fear it would acquire a reputation for turning out "block" heads.

MARKDALE JULY. 31, 1884.

A PLEASANT DRIVE.

Early last week we completed our last Voters' List for the year 1884, and there being a prospect for a few days leisure, we procured a livery rig from Thomas Mathews (of course country editors can seldom afford a horse and rig of their own) and taking along our better half, we drove, the first day, to Collingwood via. Flesherton, Maxwell, Singhampton, Duntroon and Nottawa, and the following day home, via. Thornbury, Meaford and Walter's Falls. The roads being now at their best and the weather favorable, a drive through the country is pleasant and exhilirating. The crops have a very promising appearance from Markdale to some distance out of Flesherton; but through Osprey township they are not so good, especially the oat crop, which will be very short. After leaving Singhampton there is a marked improvement; and through Nottawasaga township, where spring wheat is the prevailing crop, the prospects of an abundant harvest is to be seen on all sides. This road from Markdale and Flesherton to Collingwood presents a very different appearance from what it did some fifteen years ago, when all the farm produce of this district was teamed over it to Collingwood. Many a time, during winter season, in those days three hundred teams were counted, loaded with grain passing through Maxwell and Singhampton; but since the T., G. & B. was built the produce of the district has been shipped to Toronto over this line. The road, however, is familiar, and the country, especially through Osprey township, we are sorry to say has not improved equal to other surrounding townships. We had a pleasant call with our old esteemed friend, Mr. Henry Watson, of Duntroon, or what was better known 15 years ago as Scotch Corners. Hundreds of farmers in this section will remember Mr. Watson, in whose hotel they have eaten and slept times without number, and who is, we believe, the only hotel keeper between Flesherton and Collingwood who still holds forth in the same stand, as in the days referred to. We refer particularly to him because we consider him a model hotel keeper. He always kept a quiet and well regulated house. We have never heard him use profane language, and he informed us last week that though he has been in the hotel business for twenty years, he has never been the worse of liquor during that time. Mr. Watson was burned out three years since and has rebuilt and is now in a better position than ever to supply the wants of the travelling public. He has in his bar-room the finest specimen of an Elk head we have ever seen. It was presented to him by a friend in the North-West a year ago, and he (Mr. W.) afterwards had the head stuffed in Toronto. The body weighed 1350 lbs. The horns measure from tip to tip nine feet four inches. There are twelve prongs, measuring 22 inches each. It is indeed a magnificent head.

The road from Collingwood to Thornbury runs along the lake shore at the foot of Collingwood mountain. Vegetation on this portion of our journey is very delicate, the greater part of the way having a lonely and desolate appearance; in fact we drove this 14 miles in the midst of daylight without seeing either man or beast on the road, and from Thornbury to Meaford (10 miles) it was not much better until within a few miles of the latter place a marked change suddenly broke in, and thrifty farms with fine buildings and large fields of waving grain, orchards heavily laden with delicious fruit broke the gloomy monotony from which we emerged. Meaford is a live town with fine buildings and well kept shops, everything having the appearance of life and prosperity. Mr. James Noble conducts one of the finest hotels in Northern Ontario (The Royal), and is doing a rattling fine business. He thoroughly understands his business and makes every traveller feel at home. Several families from a distance are stopping there spending their summer months. Mr. Noble recently erected a monster stable 165 x 40 feet, in which 172 horses were housed on the 12th of July.

The road from Meaford to Walter's Falls is somewhat hilly, but the crops are excellent. We stopped an hour at the Falls; but will refer to this romantic spot in another issue. Crops between there and Markdale look well, and an abundant harvest may reasonably be expected. We arrived in Markdale at half-past seven the second day, after driving 50 miles.

Another Bear Hunt.

Last Thursday news came into Town that a bear and three cubs had routed some youngsters from a berry patch on the rear of Mr. Boyce's farm just beyond Mr. Rowe's Mill, and killed a fine sheep belonging to Mr. J. Brown. A war party was soon organized, and every cur-dog in the town and vicinity were whistled into rank. A motley group they were, both human and canine. The men were armed with every conceivable weapon. Scarcely a trade or profession in the town (except the clergy) but was represented:—the odds—in numbers—were fully against the bears, for there was our worthy barber Smith with a repeating Winchester rifle; our youthful sportsman A. Bryan, with a Queen Anne musket (trigger less), our worthy town constable Noble, shouldered a six-pound axe; T. McNea with a 21-shot repeater, and some 20 or 30 others. Upon arriving at the scene of action, every man was a general, or at least an officer; and the various commands given were more confusing than that at the building of the Tower of Babel. Constable Noble, with his axe, which would have done credit to be the veritable weapon used by Richard the Lion Heart, wanted an onslaught upon the bush; others more prudent, advised waiting until the bears made their appearance in the clearing. However, all counsels were overruled by the appearance upon the scene of Mr. Smith, of Mr. McFarland's commercial house, shouldering a rusty musket, and accompanied by a huge Newfoundland dog. A couple of hounds with the Newfoundland, were set into the bush, with some 20 or 30 yelping curs at their heels. Presently, furious growling, snarling, and yells of canine pain were heard, when the shout was heard, "they'ev got him," when a fearful crashing sound was heard, coming in the direction of the valliant besiegers of the bush, when there was such a scampering that even the (in)-famous Bull's run could not much surpass it. The crowd, at this time, could not be much less than 60 persons; for the farmers in the vicinity had arrived, armed with dung and pitch-forks, sythes and bludgeons. A short lull ensued, and then we discovered Mr. Hill, our worthy painter, who was there with drawing pencil and canvas to draw a picture of the "slay," no doubt for the illustration of the rear of Mr. Shanahans cutters next Winter. At this point we got the first view of our worthy butcher, Trelford, who was swinging a hugh cleaver in one hand and a "sticking knife" in the other; but whether he expected to make fresh meat for the market, or protect his neighbour's sheep-folds, we cannot say. Shortly afterward, a cub bear came, with childish simplicity, amongst the assembled Nimrods, when chase was given. The dogs, having imbibed the spirit of their masters, took race across the field with young bruin, in the most friendly contest for speed we have ever witnessed; W. McLeod, our athlete shoemaker, started in pursuit, and kept within kicking distance of the cub across a ten-acre field, emptied the contents of a seven shooter revolver at him, but failed to touch a vital point. The bears got away, unscathed, to play the same prank with our sharp-shooters in some other portion of this neighborhood: it is the old story over again: too much enthusiasm, without concentrated determination in the prosecution of the subject which actuates us, is apt to produce a wavering effort. The only exception to the general rule which we we have portrayed, was a mere youth, Master Willie McFarland, who could not be made to flinch from the post he took when the dogs were sent into the bush. We may conclude with:

"The boy stood on the burning deck,
When all but he had fled."

Shipwreck on Bell's Lake.

A few days ago a number of doughty mariners from this Town and vicinity determined to brave the billows and risk the dangers of the shoals, quicksands, and rock-bound coast of Bell's Lake in quest of amusement and profit by a "catch of fish. Having secured a suitable craft, well provisioned and liquored for a lengthened cruise, the jolly fishermen weighed anchor and hoisted sail amid the huzzas and waving of handkerchiefs by an admiring crowd, who watched their departure from the only pier in Misfortune bay. Captain S. having made his "reckonings," ordered all hands below, where an impromptu speech was delivered, to which all hands responded in a double decker of regulation whiskey. Lines and nets were soon cast, and all went merry as a marriage-bell; and upon each "haul" the god of fishes, Aquarius, was honored in a flowing bowl, and for this honor the little god sent them abundant success; but in the extreme height of prosperity we are nearest a fall, so it was with our gallant fishermen. They anchored on the lee side of Island Bacchanalia, where they landed to pay their devouts to the hilaric god; but, during their devotions a piratical crew stealthily cut the cable, hoist sail, and made to sea with craft, seines fishing-tackle, and all. Upon this discovery a Prayer-meeting was held. Captain S. declined to officiate, on the ground that the only prayer he knew was that learned at his mother's knee, and he had never repeated it since; the First Mate declined because he considered himself a backslider; hence it was resolved to offer mute thanks. How soon humanity forgets good resolutions; for no sooner had the mute ceremony ended, than recriminations followed, uttered in language that would have been the equal to that of "Our Army in Flanders." The Captain vowed that the entire blame rested upon the First Mate, in that he had victualed the vessel with inferiar rations, which demoralized the crew; that he himself had been in the victualing line for twenty years, and no such catastrophe had ever occurred; the Mate shouldered the blame upon the Boatswain, who had neglected his duty. Here poor boatswain B. had been in some measure the cause of the disaster, that he should, Jonah like, undertake the hazardous feat of swimming, to the main land for assistance. Another mute appeal was made for his success, which he accomplished, after a herculean struggle with stormy waves. A short distance from the beach lives pious Widow L. and an only son. The boatswain approached, cautiously; but the ever-watchful house-dog discovered him in his nude state a few yards from the dwelling, when poor dog Tray uttered a howl and made for the woods, and was not seen for three days. The boatswain approached the door, and the widow being at that moment alone, uttered a shriek, fell upon her knees, crossed herself, and implored Divine protection for, as she expressed it, "I didn't know whither it war a ghost or a man-mermaid that cum out of the lake." Young L., who was attending affairs at the barn, hearing the noise, made hasty steps for the house, whereupon the boatswain took refuge under a waggon, whom the young man, in the darkness, mistook for his mother. His mistake was soon dispelled: the boatswain came out from his hiding-place in mother-nakedness, explained the situation, and the entire party were soon relieved from their deplorable situation on Island Bacchanalia.

The Flesherton Advance, under the above head, complains of the course pursued by its more successful neighbors of the press, ourselves included. We would be surprised had it been otherwise. The Advance during its three years history, has gained for itsself a wide reputation for the manufacture and dissemination of discord and personal abuse, and has therefore been enimently successful in making hosts of enemies, and now envies the success of others. As there is no point in the article referred to we take no further notice of it. The public have no interest in personal squabbles; such is likely to bring the noble power into disrepute with the multitude.

No Match!

To the Editor of the Standard.

There is no match to low envy. The equal of a selfish mind cannot find its match outside of its own groveling ranks.

The success of the season horse, "Clear Grit," as a successful stock-getter gives vexation to that class of individuals who envy those who are possessors of property superior to themselves. Valentines are usually sent in jest—nothing more—but he who tests the merits of "Clear Grit" will acknowledge that his properties and published qualities are all earnest and genuine.

A rumor has been industriously circulated that "Clear Grit" is not all that his pedigree claims. Let the doubters investigate and publish a truthful record to the world, and I will pay them a handsome sum for the advertisement.

The merits of the horse are a sufficient guarantee to the public, without any advocacy of mine; but the vile nature of the slanders of the groom, puffer Henry Jim, I had in my employ last year (whose services I dispensed with, for substantial reasons), and superseded with a better man, Mr. John Gilkinson, caused me to descend to bandy words with an unworthy servant.

To one and all:—Let those who are so glib in their untruthful scrutiny of "Clear Grit's" pedigree, take care that I don't open an unwelcome light upon the pedigree of their own horse-stalls.

Where the shoe pinches, is the fact that this season "Clear Grit" has covered more mares than any other horse ever before in the County of Grey.

The public's obedient servant,

JAMES TRIMBLE.

W. H. Crooker, druggist of Waterdown, says, when all other remedies fail for Bowel Complaints, then Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry comes to the rescue.

THE stringency of the money market has caused many unexpected bankrupticies, thus throwing spring goods of the present year upon the market. If they are not all that the best can offer, I will make your wife a present of a new dress, and one for the baby. Try Trimble.

MR. VEREY gave us an exhibition of his Panorama in this place on Monday and Tuesday evening which was fairly attended and highly interesting. Every person within reach this beautiful exhibition of historic and other scenery should see it; it cannot fail to be profitable as well as instructive.

DULL TIMES is the cry on every hand, and our own financial income would justify us in going on echoe to what seems to be an almost universal shout; but, often as you may pass Benson's, the crowd of men, women, boys and girls in their establishment, would indicate that business must be in a flourishing condition. Perhaps the secret of all this prosperity lies in the fact that Benson's house has been long and favorably known; besides, the house has always had the reputation of selling at the lowest margin of profit of any other house in town. Another feature, or figure, in their success in drawing trade is their reputation of selling at low profits and quick returns, thus keeping up a constant supply of fresh goods.

PREJUDICED PEOPLE.

Many people are prejudiced against patent medicines but all who try Burdock Blood Bitters are compelled to acknowledge it worthy a patent as a valuable discovery.

INVALUABLE TO EVERY LADY!

"MAY DEW"

The Great French Lotion for Beautifying the Face.

It conceals the evidence of age. One application will make the most stubbornly red and rough hands beautifully soft and white. Remember that "MAY DEW" is not a paint or powder that fills up the pores of the skin, and that is injurious to the skin, but a new and great discovery, a vegetable liquid, that causes the cheek to glow with health, the neck, arms and hands to rival the Lily in whiteness. Impossible to detect in the beauty it confers any artificial character. It cures greasy Skin, Freckles, Wrinkles, Pimples, Black Heads, Crow's Feet, Blotches, Face Grubs, Sun Burn, Tan, Ringworm, Chapped Hands, Sore or Chapped Lips, Barber's Itch, Tetter, etc. It frees the pores, oil glands, and tubes from the injurious effects of powders and cosmetic washes. By its use all redness and roughness are prevented; it beautifies the skin, and will make it soft, smooth and white; imparting a delicious softness; imparting a perfectly healthy, natural and youthful appearance. The best face lotion that the world ever produced. We will send "A LARGE BOTTLE" to any address on receipt of price, $1. When ordering mention this paper.

Address all letters to the MAY DEW AGENCY, 167 Church Street, Toronto, Ont. Parlor and Reception Room for Ladies.

THE TRUE BOOK OF MORMON.

Latter Day Saints Revising Their Bibles in Missouri.

Several prominent members of the Reorganised Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints are now in Richmond, Mo., on a curious errand. David Whitmer, the only living witness of the alleged miracle by which the Book of Mormon was given to the world, is a resident of this town. He is a very old man, but he retains his vigor in a marvellous degree, and his memory is still good. He has a fine old home here, where he has lived for many years, respected by all. No man in the State stands higher in the estimation of his neighbors. He is eminently pious, and lives his religion. Mr. Whitmer's possession of the original manuscript of the Book of Mormon has long been known to members of the Church, but he has steadily refused to part with it, though often solicited to do so. The polygamous Mormons have made several efforts to gain possession of the coveted papers, but Whitmer has declined to listen to any proposition they might make. The gentlemen now here are prominent officials of the organization in Missouri, Iowa, Ohio, and New York. Many errors have crept into the numerous editions of the book during the last twenty years, and it was thought desirable to compare the present version with the original text before the death of Mr. Whitmer, who holds most tenaciously to the manuscript. This examination is still in progress. Several verbal errors have been discovered, and in a few instances entire sentences have been found to have been perverted. The original contains no authorization of polygamy, as the version in use in Utah does, and these gentlemen denounce the Mormons of that Territory in the severest terms.

Mr. Whitmer's faith in what he claims to have seen is remarkable. He recited his experience at the time of the revelation to his visitors as follows: "In 1828 when I lived in Ontario county, N. Y., there was great excitement over the discovery by Joseph Smith, a farmer in our neighborhood, of a great treasure. Nothing was known of it in a definite way by my family until the next year, in June, when Smith visited my father's house. While there he was busily engaged in the translation of the book which I learned he had found, in the form of gold plates, on the hill Cumorah, about two miles from Palmyra. I saw the plates frequently in Smith's hands, but as the characters inscribed upon them were something like Egyptian hieroglyphics, I could make nothing out of them. Smith, however, had no difficulty in deciphering them, and as he dictated Oliver Cowdrey wrote. I asked Smith once how he came to find the plates, and he told me that the place on the hill was pointed out to him by an angel in dazzling apparel. They were in a stone casket and purported to be the history of the Nephites, a nation that had passed away. The plates, as I saw them, were fastened with three rings. About half of them were loose and movable, but the others were solid as if sealed. Smith said in explanation of this that the angel had told him very impressively that the loose plates alone were to be used, and that the sealed portion was not to be tampered with.

"I became interested in the matter, as Smith was a man of good repute. After the plates had been translated, six months having been passed in the work, the same heavenly visitant appeared to Smith and reclaimed the tablets, informing Smith that he would replace them with other records of the lost tribes that had been brought with them from Asia, and that they would be all forthcoming when the world was ready to receive them. I saw this apparition myself, gazed with awe on the celestial messenger and heard him say: 'Blessed is the Lord and he that keeps his commandments.' Then, as he held the plates and turned them over with his hands so that we could see them plainly, a voice that seemed to fill all space was heard, saying: 'What you see is true. Testify to the same.' Oliver Cowdrey and I, standing there, felt, as the white garment of the angel faded from view, that we had received a message from God, and we have so recorded it. Two or three days later the same angel appeared to Martin Harris while he was in company with Smith, and placed the same injunction upon him. He described the sight and his sensations to me and they corresponded exactly with what I had seen and heard. In his translation of the tablets Smith used a small oval or kidney-shaped stone, which seemed endowed with the marvellous power of converting the characters on the plates, when used by Smith, into English. He would then dictate and Cowdrey would write. Frequently one character would make two lines of manuscript, while others made but a word or two. I can assert emphatically, as did Cowdrey, that while Smith was dictating he had no manuscript notes, or other means of knowledge save the seer stone and the characters as shown on the plates.

"As an evidence of our belief in the divine origin of the book, I can say that Martin Harris, one of the witnesses, mortgaged his farm for $1,500 for the purpose of having it printed, and we all contributed time and money for the purpose of circulating it. A few years ago Orson Pratt and Joseph F. Smith, who had been sent from Utah to secure the original manuscript came here, and after a careful examination Elder Pratt assured those present that the writing was in the hand of Oliver Cowdrey. He declared that the archives at Salt Lake were incomplete without it, and he offered me any reasonable sum for it, but I refused to part with it, as I regarded it as a sacred trust."

Mr. Whitmer's beliefs have undergone no change. He has refused to affiliate with any of the various branches of the Church that have sprung up through false teachings, and he rests his hopes of the future "on the teachings of Christ, the apostles, and the prophets, and the morals and principles inculcated in the Scriptures." He also declares that the Book of Mormon is but the testimony of another nation concerning the truth and divinity of Christ and the Bible, and that that is his rock, his gospel, and his salvation. Having been misrepresented by the various branches of the Church, he recently had the following proclamation printed, and, having many copies in his possession, he gives them to all of his callers:

Unto all nations, kindred tongues and people unto whom these presents shall come: It having been represented by one John Murphy of Polo, Caldwell county, Mo., that I in a conversation with him last summer denied my testimony as one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon;

To the end, therefore, that he may understand me now if he did not then, and that the world may know the truth, I wish now, standing as it were in the very sunset of life and in the fear of God, once for all to make this statement: That I have never at any time denied that testimony or any part thereof, which has so long since been published with the book as one of the three witnesses. Those who know me best well know that I have always adhered to that testimony, and that no man may be misled or doubt my present views in regard to the same, I do again affirm the truth of all my statements as then made and published. "He that hath an ear to hear, let him hear." It was no delusion. What is written is written, and he that readeth let him understand.

And, that no one may be deceived by this statement, I wish here to state that I do not endorse polygamy or spiritual wifeism. It is a great evil, shocking to the moral sense, and the more so because practised in the name of religion. It is of man and not of God, and is especially forbidden in the Book of Mormon itself.

I do not endorse the change of the name of the Church, for as the wife takes the name of her husband, so should the Church of the Lamb of God take the name of its head, even Christ himself. It is the Church of Christ.

As to the high priesthood, Jesus Christ, himself is the last great high priest. This, too, after the order of Melchisedec, as I understand the holy Scriptures.

Finally, I do not endorse any of the teachings of the so-called Mormons, or Latter Day Saints, which are in conflict with the gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ as taught in the Bible and the Book of Mormon, for the same gospel is plainly taught in both these books as I understand the Word of God.

And if any man doubt, should he not carefully and honestly read and understand the same before presuming to sit in judgment and condemning the light which shineth in darkness and showeth the way of eternal life as pointed out by the unerring hand of God?

In the Spirit of Christ, who hath said, "Follow thou me, for I am the life, the light, and the way," I submit this statement to the world, God, in whom I trust, being my judge as to the sincerity of my motives and the faith and hope that is in me of eternal life.

My sincere desire is that the world may be benefitted by this plain and simple statement of the truth.

And all the honor be to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, which is one God.

DAVID WHITMER

Appended to the above are the signatures of many of the most prominent citizens of Missouri, all bearing witness to Mr. Whitmer's probity and purity of life.

It is not known what disposition he will make of the manuscripts in his possession. The papers have been cut up into printers' "takes," and are soiled to some extent, but the handwriting is very plain, and not a word is missing. The non-polygamous Mormons in this section are increasing in numbers, principally by reason of the profound respect for the faith which Mr. Whitmer's blameless life has inculated.

The Life Story of the Discoverer of the Cholera Germ.

An interesting sketch of the life of Robert Koch, the discoverer of the cholera germ, the man whose name is at present in everybody's mouth, appears in a recent number of the Gartenlaube. Dr. Koch, who is now 41 years old, is a son of the Hartz Mountain. In 1866 he took his M D degree. For the next six years he slowly and laboriously worked his way upward as assistant physician in out-of-the-way hospitals. Fortune did not smooth his road, and when in 1872 he got an appointment at Wollstein the struggle for existence had again to be fought for seven years. Under circumstances so unfavorable for scientific research he prosecuted his studies with a success which secured a world-wide recognition of his genius. His first distinction was won by the publication of the results of his quiet labour on the methods of the artificial dyeing of micros opic objects, especially of bacteria. By the general public his discovery could not be appreciated, but those who understood the value of these researches in the prosecution of the study of bactaria knew that with it a new era had dawned for science. This conviction has been brilliantly confirmed. During the last five years he has succeeded in identifying the germs of cattle disease, of consumption, and of cholera. These discoveries are not incidental strokes of good luck, but the natural fruits of his own system of research. The significance of these discoveries is felt even by those who have no knowledge of medicine. Experiments in vaccination with the poisonous matter, experiments in disinfection in laboratories, wholesale experiments in disappearance of epidemics—all these are but links in the chain, the last link of which the destruction of the germ of the disease, is now more attainable, but has become even probable. Honors have been conferred upon Dr. Koch and his colleagues on coming home from India, the breeding place of cholera. They have received titles and orders to which, in honour of the personal danger of the voyage of discovery, were added such distinctions as otherwise are only conferred on soldiers. By addresses and banquets colleagues have honoured them, and it it said that the new Professorship of Hygiene, at Berlin, will be given to Dr. Koch. In short, outward acknowledgements have been plentifully made to the modest, quiet scholar. Although the Germans call him theirs with pride, he will always remain what he is, universal, and he deserves the full and the honourable title of "benefactor of humanity."

James Freeman Clarke's Latin.

"Thirty years ago," says James Freeman Clarke, "I tried the new method of pronouncing Latin. I was travelling in Italy. My wife, happening to see a priest pass by, asked me the meaning of the tonsure. At that moment, not recollecting it significance, I said, 'I don't know; but there is a priest, and I will ask him.' Not knowing Italian then, I first constructed a Latin sentence. I thought I had made it very well, and then I put it exactly, as—I imagined, into the Italian pronounciation, got it ready to say, and then went to him and said it. 'Eh! Che dice?' he asked. I repeated it again. 'Ah,' said he. 'I understand. Here take this man to a confessor. He wants to confess his sins.' This was as near as I ever came to the Continental pronounciation of Latin; and I have never tried it since."

A TERRIBLE EXPERIENCE.

The Horrors of the Arctic as Experienced by an Explorer in the Frozen Region.

The sufferings of the survivors of the Greely expedition recalls the thrilling experience of a part of the crew of the steamer Polaris. As told by seaman William Nidemann, whose heroic conduct in the ill-fated Jeanette expedition has given his name a place in the history of exploration, it rivals the wildest story ever penned by a fiction writer. "I can never forget," he said, "the terrible experience of our party of nineteen when we were carried away from the Polaris. It was on the 15th of October, 1872 we ran in among icebergs and were caught fast. Every moment we expected to see the vessel crushed, so we began to get provisions out on the ice. Suddenly the ice broke and away went the Polaris, leaving nineteen of us including two Esquimaux with their families. A blinding snow-storm was raging, and in fifteen minutes the Polaris was out of sight. We had on the piece of ice on which we were drifting provisions enough to last us a month, and for 196 days we drifted about, sometimes surrounded by great icebergs towering high above our heads, again drifting in the open water; sometimes compelled to move hastily to prevent our being carried away when the ice broke, or again swept and drenched by the heavy seas breaking over our iceland home. Soon our provisions got so low that we were put on allowance of one biscuit a day. We used to sit by the hour telling the most silly stories, listening to yarns spun by Peter Johnson, a seaman on board the Polaris, about catching seals, but we did not care to talk of home. We thought that we were lost, and lost past finding, but we lived on just the same. Once in a while we would catch a seal and drink its blood. Then we would eat the seal. We threw nothing away except the gall. The entrails were thrown on the ice to freeze, and when they were solid we eat them. And when we had not even this, we chewed the sealskin, hair and all, for there was life in it. Early in the April following we were on a piece of ice perhaps 300 feet square, and were starving. To add to our misery a rain storm set in, and continued for three days. Our tent was swept away, and for three days not a person slept. We were soaking wet, and our piece of ice rolled and tumbled in such a way that we expected every moment to be washed overboard. Then the ice came together again and we started out hunting, Hans Christiansen and Joe Ebeling, the Esquimaux, and I. We were terribly hungry, for we had nothing to eat for some days. Fortunately we saw a bear and succeeded in killing him. And what a feast we had that night. I can never forget our feeling when one day we saw a steamer. We danced with joy and fired our guns and shouted, but the people on the steamer did not see us, and she passed from our sight. Our hearts sank and we gave ourselves up for lost. Then, when in the fog, Linquest, one of the party, gave the shout, "Ship ahoy!" you should have seen us jump. There she was, and we could just see her boom. We again fired our guns and shouted. But we could get no reply, for a ship going through ice makes a terrible noise. Our hearts again sank as we saw her passing away from our sight. Suddenly she came into view again, and they saw us. We were taken aboard, and finally reached St. John's. It was the steamer Tigress, and she had picked us up in the nick of time. Strange to say that every person in the party caught a heavy cold when once on board of the Tigress, and all the time we were drifting on the ice each man preserved good health.

How Industrious Italian Women Are.

How little we know of people unless we live with them. Our idea of Italian women, for instance, is that they spend their time like Turkish sultanas, sleeping and lounging listlessly in soft couches, their only occupation being love making or perchance learning how to sing a song. Never was there a greater mistake. Italian women, even in towns and in good circumstances, work harder than any other women I know. Not a stitch is done in the house that they do not do. They spin and make their own linen, rear their own silk worms, knit their own stockings and the stockings for the whole family, make their own dresses, hats, bonnets, cloaks, and superintend all the baking, cooking, and cleaning of the house, if they do not possibly do it themselves. They rarely go out except on Sundays, and holidays, and rarely receive visitors unless in the highest society, when one day a week is set aside for receiving. They are perfect slaves to their husbands, whose comforts they study from morning until night. I have heard much of Italian illicit love making, but I have never seen it. It may exist, perhaps among the aristocracy, but in the middle and lower classes it is more imagination than reality. Bonny brides, even in high society, still maintain the custom of making their own wedding outfits. A young friend of mine, who has just married, has brought her husband four dozen of every article of body and house linen, all made and embroidered with her own hands, even the lace which trims the house linen being her own work. All the stockings, also, were knitted by herself. Nor is this the exception; it is the rule in Italy. Who, after this, shall say that the Italian women are idlers? No one, certainly, who has known and seen them as I have will ever say so; on the contrary, I would hold them up as models for all other women to imitate. Why, even in Rome, once the al of the world, the women spend their time between their house and their church, varying these with an occasional walk on Sundays and great holidays, while everything in the house is done by themselves, servants being too expensive for most incomes nowadays.

Wanted to Continue to grow Old.

Old Mme. Rothschild, mother of the mighty capitalists, attained the age of ninety-eight. Her wit, which was remarkable, and her intellectual faculties, which were of no common order, were preserved to the end. In her last illness, when surrounded by her family, her physician being present, she whispered in a suppliant tone to the latter. "Dear doctor, try to do something for me." "Madame, what can I do? I cannot make you young again." "No, doctor, I don't want to be young again, but I want to continue to grow old."

A curious yet true tale is current at Munich. King Louis of Bavaria is eaten up with debts. Some days ago he tried to effect a loan with the famous Berlin banker, Herr von Bleichroeder, and also with the Darmstadt Bank. Unsuccessful in both applications, the King, refusing to comply with the proposed conditions, sought three Munich bankers, and has settled with them by giving a portion of the Crown lands as security.

Statistics show that the tendency to suicide is much greater among regular gamblers from lo ses than other business men. The sharp strain of the gambling table, short though it may be, spoils the nerves, and weakens fortitude more than the strain of business. Cavour, one of the most serene of men, was within an ace on one great gambling night, of throwing half his fortune away rather than call a card, and only called it, as he relates himself, because a drop of perspiration rose on his opponent's forehead.

Announcements have recently appeared that the order of the Double Dragon has been confered on two or three distinguished personages. This is a new order instituted by the Emperor of China in harmony with Western ideas. It is divided into five grades, the first three of which are subdivided into three classes. The first grade in the three classes is reserved for sovereigns, princes, and other magnates, with a remarkably quaint, beautiful, oblong decoration, in which respect it differs from the others, which are round, with inverted edges, except the last two, which are round and plain. They are enamelled, and of various colors.

The Paris police are carrying on most active operations of late against a regular organized band of young ruffians of the very worst type, who have for a long time been a terror to Neuilly and all around it. One of their dodges was to congregate near the Arc de Triomphe, and watch for cabs with luggage. These they followed to a residence, and were most obliging in assisting to take the luggage into the house. While there they took cognizance of the bolts and fastenings of windows and doors, and gained information extremely valuable to those burgling there in the course of a night or two.

A Berlin correspondent writes that the malady of the Empress of Germany, which has assumed a cancerous character, dates back forty years, to the birth of her daughter the Grand Duchess of Baden. To the repeated recommendations of her physicians to quit Berlin, she has always given the answer: "A home needs a housewife and a court a Queen." Her residence some twenty years ago at Coblentz is said to have been suggested in an unmistakeable manner by her husband, in consequence of her having shown a disposition to oppose the views of Prince Bismarck. The Empress's sufferings have helped to make her deeply sympathetic with those of others.

The head quarters of the gamblers in Paris is a beer shop in the Faubourg St. Denis, where, in the last fortnight of June, all the shady knights of baccarat assemble. The house looks very tidy and respectable, and no games are allowed there but back-gammon and dominoes. Numbers who frequent this cafe are not aware that they are in a den of card sharpers. The latter, the philoephers, and their collaborators, styled in England "bonnets," keep their appointments there, transact their little business, and make their arrangements for the season, without paying any attention to the detectives, one or two of whom are always present in a disguise that never deceives those interested.

At a concert in Dublin, a thought reader [illegible] and hid by one of the audience. Several of them came forward, among whom was a confederate. The pin was hid by a Trinity stu[illegible] in an adjoining room, in the presence of a committee, among which was the confederate. The student, suspecting this was [illegible] his looks, slyly took the pin from its hid[illegible] place. On the return to the platform [illegible] thought reader gazed into the hider's [illegible] and putting his hand to his brow, was blin[illegible] folded and led the student to the [illegible] place, but of course could find no pin. [illegible] returned, acknowledging his defeat, [illegible] looking daggers at the confederate. "[illegible] gentleman," said the student, "I'll [illegible] take to say that if this 'diviner of the [illegible] man mind' will do as I tell him half [illegible] audience, without a single hint from me, [illegible] know where the pin is," and, turning to [illegible] thought reader, he said: "Sit down." [illegible] did so. There was a yell, and, jumping [illegible] the thought reader hastily pulled from [illegible] seat of his trousers the marked pin.

The Panama Canal.

In spite of the obstacles due to the [illegible] healthiness of the district, sparseness [illegible] population, and the mechanical difficulties [illegible] of construction progress is being made. The [illegible] line of the canal is divided into 23 sections, [illegible] superintended by four engineers in chief. The preliminary work of organizing is now [illegible] practically completed, and actual work on [illegible] the canal begins to make a show. The amount of excavation completed up to March [illegible] last is about six million cubic metres, and it is anticipated that three times as much work will be completed. Six dredges of the Sisyphus [illegible] en type are being constructed in Philadelphia at a cost of £25,000 each. They are capable of dredging alluvium and soft coral rock. Schist and grit can be dredged after blasting. Two dredges are expected to arrive from New York, one dredge was burned in January but has been replaced by another, one commenced work in May. The sum expended during the past 3½ years amounts to between £6,000,000 and £7,000,000. The effect of the canal operations has been to double the traffic in both passengers and goods on the Panama Railway. Panama itself is increasing in population, and building is very active, whilst at Colon, the other extremity of the line, the place is hardly to be recognized; from a small hamlet in 1880 it has become thriving town with a brisk trade and streets swarming with people. Houses, stores and other edifices, have been constructed all over the island of Manzanilla, and the swamps and marshes are being reclaimed. In the harbor as many as sixty ships may be seen at times lying at anchor waiting for their turn to be discharged, the accommodation in quays and wharves being quite insufficient for the rapidly grown traffic. Upwards of 82 000 tons of machinery and stores were discharged last year for the Canal Company at Colon. There is thus a considerable activity, and the construction of the canal is indirectly benefitting the country generally, developing and bringing within the boundaries of civilization and commercial enterprise.

Capuchin Monkeys.

Some of these little monkeys really appear to reason, and are very clever. Rengger states that when he first gave eggs to his monkeys they smashed them, and thus lost much of their contents; afterward they gently hit one end against some hard body and picked off the bits of shells with their fingers. After cutting themselves only once with a sharp tool they would not touch it again, or would handle it with the greatest care. Lumps of sugar were often given them when wrapped up in paper, and Rengger sometimes put a live wasp into the paper so that in hastily unfolding it they got stung. After this had happened once they always first held the packet to their ears to detect any movement within. This breaking of the egg in a proper manner is as interesting as two well-known facts, one of which may be observed by anybody in the habits of American and other monkeys. Sometimes a little monkey has a nut given him, and he is not strong enough to crack it. He will look up into your face with a meaning glimmer of his eyes and hand you the nut again. Crack it for him, and he receives it as a matter of course. Formerly one of the largest monkeys in the Zoological Gardens had weak teeth, and he used to break open the nuts with a stone, and Mr. Darwin was assured by the keepers that this animal after using the stone, hid it in the straw, and would not let any other monkey touch it. Rengger taught one to open palm-nuts by breaking them with a stone, and so satisfied was it with its performance, that it soon began to experiment on other kinds of nuts, and then it began upon boxes. It also crushed off with blows of a stone the soft rind of a fruit that had a disagreeable flavor, in order to get at the luscious food within.

British Export Trade.

The exports of British and Irish produce and manufactures during the first five months of this year are valued at £96 971 999, an increase of £40,036 on the returns last year. A falling off of £1,204,245 in the exports of iron and metals is the only unfavorable feature of the export trade worthy of notice, either a considerable increase or a slight falling off being shown. The most remarkable change has occurred in the import trade, the total value of our imports having declined £10 597,173. The figures for the first five months of last year were £180,555 412, and this year they are £169 958 239. The remarkable decline is entirely owing to the decreasing imports of food, the value being £12 000,000 less than last year. It cannot be supposed that the nation eats less, but the natural inference is that the country has contributed more towards the food supply during the past five months than it did in the corresponding period of last year. We should never neglect to buy our food in the cheapest market, although when that market happens to be America, we may regret that our manufactures are not taken in payment for our food; but it is none the less pleasing to believe that our farmers are competing successfully to supply the home market with food. The agricultural interest has suffered from the encroachment of foreign competitors, but the nation at large is benefited by supplies of food at cheaper rates than those at which it could be produced at home. With an improvement in the agricultural industry will come an increased home demand for iron.—London Iron Trade Exchange.

SCIENTIFIC GOSSIP.

Dr. Vigouroux recommends a glass of lemonade, taken as hot as possible every hour or half hour, as not only an easy and agreeable but a most efficient cure for diarrhœa.

Prof. Miall says there are to be found associated with seams of coal, and especially in the underlying shale, the flattened impressions of creatures which once had ... though at first strenuously doubted.

A well-deserved honor has been conferred on M. Cailletet, one of the two physicists who liquefied the last of the gases. He has been nominated a "Membre libre" by the Academy of Sciences, Paris, in place of the late M. du Moncel.

To preserve wood from decay and render it fairly fire proof, a solution of lime, salt, and wood ashes may be applied. Enough lampblack or yellow ochre may be added to impart color if desired. For light fences and small wooden structures it ought to do very well.

New iron works will soon be opened at ..., Japan, by a native capitalist, who has engaged several hundred men trained at the Alabama Iron Works and elsewhere in ...kio. It is also stated that as the iron yielded by the ore of the Shimonida mine has proved itself to be of a very fine quality it will be employed hereafter for the armor of Japanese war vessels, according to instructions issued by the Naval Department.

A German statistician says that there are 3,985 paper mills in the world, and that of the 1,904,000,000 pounds of paper turned out annually half is used for printing, 600,000,000 pounds being required for newspapers alone, the consumption of which has grown by 200,000,000 pounds in the last decade. He alleges that on an average an Englishman uses annually 11½ pounds of paper, an American 10¼, a German 8, a Frenchman 7½, an Italian or an Austrian ..., a Spaniard 1½, a Russian 1⅓, and a Mexican 1.

An official report from Col. Majendie, ... Ford, and Capt. Cundil, British inspectors of explosives, states that within the past year the dynamite trade in Great Britain had grown considerably, four new factories for explosives having been erected; the number of license storage magazines had increased from 320 to 329; and the total number of registered premises for explosives in the United Kingdom is 19,386. During 1883 there were 179 explosions, causing the death of 89 and the injury of 109 persons.

Prof. O. C. Marsh finds that the skulls of the pterodactyls of the Middle Chalk, West Kansas, differ from those of other known Pterosauria in the absence of teeth and of anterior nasal apertures distinct from the antorbital openings; in the presence of the elongated occipital crest, and, lastly, on the ... jaws, which appear to have been covered with a horny sheath, as in recent birds. All these cretaceous reptiles belong to the genus Pteranodon. Some of the species were of enormous size, with a spread of wings of about 25 feet.

If, says M. Montigny in L'Electricite, we cast a rapid glance over the progress that has been made in electricity in less than half a century, we shall see that after presenting itself suddenly under an entirely new form in the Volta pile, after manifesting its surprising action upon magnets and currents at a moment when the science of the phenomena engendered by the pile seemed to some to be exhausted, electricity is again presenting itself under a new light in induction apparatus wherein it is excited by the most surprising means.

The physical comfort of a man who, of his own accord, is industrious, the Builder and Woodworker says, is in every way a matter which has an actual money value. Those who are disinclined to keep steadily at work should be allowed no pretense of excuse of unsuitable surroundings. The inference it adds is plain: Do justice to your workmen, and, as a rule, they will do justice to you; at any rate, any injustice to them will surely, sooner or later, be returned with interest.

It is not unlikely that the diamond field at Bingera, New South Wales, will equal in richness the famous Kimberley district of South Africa. At Bingera within the last ... months hundreds of diamonds have been discovered, and the size and number of the gems are said to increase with the depth of the diggings. A very formidable obstacle to the development of the locality has been removed by the discovery of abundance of water for diamond washing and other purposes at no greater depth than 50 or 60 feet from the surface.

A 3 year-old gorilla which died lately at the Jardin des Plantes, Paris, was imported from the Gaboon district, West Africa, and was the first living specimen of this ape ever brought to France. He was surly and solitary in his habits, barely tolerating any of the other apes near him. His intelligence was far below that of the orang-outang or the chimpanzee. He had full command of his well-developed hands. His physiognomy, says Milne-Edwards, was very peculiar, the eyes being very mobile, and crowned with large superciliary ridges, the nose flat, and the nostrils wide.

Dr. W. Alexeyeff, of the Russian Chemical and Physical Society, has published a memoir on the specific heat of solutions. After a searching investigation of those solutions which are accompanied by a lowering of temperature he believes that this phenomenon takes place in those liquids which have not a chemical affinity, and that these liquids are true solutions. On the other hand, in those cases where a rise of temperature occurs, he believes that the dissolved liquids enters into chemical combination with the dissolving one.

Paper bottles are made on a large scale in Germany and Austria. This is the recipe for the stock: Ten parts of rags, 40 of straw, and 50 of brown wood pulp are thoroughly incorporated. The paper is impregnated or coated on both sides with 60 parts of defibrinated fresh blood, 35 parts of lime powder, and 5 parts of sulphate of alumina. After drying, 10 or 12 rolled sheets are coated again, placed over each other, and then laid in heated moulds where the pressure, acting on the albumen of the blood and the lime, produces a strong and durable combination. Bottles are formed of two pieces joined together.

When in England Cetywayo and his attendant Zulus are reported to have sought and found relief from coughs and colds in this remedy: About 18 ounces of good ..., after the peels were removed, were slightly incised and boiled for three quarters of an hour in 35 ounces of water, with 13½ ounces of moist sugar and 2½ ounces of honey. The liquid was then strained and bottled for use. One tablespoonful was taken when the attack of coughing was severe, and half a tablespoonful at intervals afterward until the distressing symptoms disappeared. This treatment of cold has a familiar old New-England sound.

DISCOVERED BY A DREAM.

How a Terrible Murder was Unearthed.

In 1861 a young man stopped at an inn in the little town of Argentiere, near the foot of the Cevennes Mountains in France. The first night while sleeping there he dreamed a dream that made a strong impression on him.

"I thought I had arrived in the same town," so he related, "but in the middle of the evening; that I had put up at the same inn, and gone out immediately in order to see whatever was worthy of observation in the place. Presently, I reached a miserable cottage, in front of which was a garden covered with weeds. I had no great difficulty in getting into the garden, for the hedge had several wide gaps in it. I approached an old well that stood solitary and gloomy in a distant corner, and looking down into it, beheld, without any possibility of mistake, a corpse which had been stabbed in several places. I counted the deep wounds and wide gashes. There were six."

At this moment he awoke with his hair on end, trembling in every limb, and cold drops of perspiration bedewing his forehead. He sprang from his bed, dressed himself, and, as it was yet early, sought an appetite for his breakfast by a morning walk. He went accordingly into the street and strolled along. The farther he went the stronger became the confused recollection of the objects that presented themselves to his view. He hurried forward, no longer doubting that the next moment would bring him to the cottage; and this was really the case. In all its exterior appearances it corresponded with what he had seen in his dream. He entered the garden and went directly to the spot where he had seen the well; but here the resemblance failed; there was none. He looked in every direction, examined the whole garden, and even went round the cottage, which seemed to be inhabited; but nowhere could he find any signs of a well. He then hastened back to the inn in a state of excitement hard to describe. He went to the landlord, and asked him directly to whom the cottage belonged that was on the by-road.

Said he: "It is inhabited by an old man and his wife, who have the character of being very unsocial. They scarcely ever leave the house, see anybody, and nobody goes to see them. Of late, their very existence appears to have been forgotten, and I believe that you are the first who for years, has turned your steps to the lonely spot."

Hastening to the nearest magistrate, he related the whole circumstance briefly and clearly. "It is very strange," said the officer. "I will place two of the police at your command: you can then go once more to the hovel, and search every part of it."

He allowed but a very few minutes to elapse before he was on his way, accompanied by two officers. The old man received them somewhat uncivilly, but showed no mark of suspicion when they told him they wished to search the house.

"Very well: as fast and as soon as you please," was the reply.

"Have you a well here?"

"No, sir; we are obliged to get our water from a spring about a quarter of a mile distant."

They searched the house, but discovered nothing of any consequence. They however, resolved to inspect the garden. By this time a number of persons had collected together outside, having been drawn to the spot by the sight of a stranger with two policemen. They were asked if they knew anything of a well in those parts. They replied they did not; the idea seemed to perplex them. At length an old woman came forward, leaning on a crutch.

"A well?" said she. "Is it a well you are looking for? That has been gone these thirty years. I remember as if it were yesterday; how I used to throw stones into it just to hear the splash of the water."

"Do you remember where that well used to be?" asked the gentleman.

"As near as I can recollect," replied the woman, "it is on the very spot where you now stand."

He suddenly started as if he had trodden upon a serpent. They at once commenced digging up the ground. At about twenty inches deep they came to a layer of bricks, which, being broken up, revealed some rotten boards. These were easily removed, when they beheld the mouth of the well.

"I was quite certain that this was the spot," said the old woman. "What fools they were to stop it up, and then have to travel so far for water!"

A sounding-line, furnished with hooks, was now let down into the well—the crowd hard pressing around them, breathlessly bending over the black and fetid hole, the secrets of which seemed hidden in impenetrable obscurity. This was repeated several times without any result. At length, penetrating below the mud, the hooks caught in something of considerable weight, and after much time and effort they succeeded raising it. It was an old chest. The sides and lids were decayed, and it needed no blacksmith to open it. Within it they found what they were sure they would find, and which filled the spectators with horror—the remains of a human body!

The police officers now rushed into the house and secured the old man. As to his wife she at first could not be found. But, after a fatiguing search, she was discovered beneath a pile of wood, being much bruised by the heavy logs above her. By this time nearly the whole population of the town had collected around the spot.

The old couple were brought before the proper authorities and separately examined. The man persisted in his denial most obstinately; but his wife at once confessed that she and her husband, a very long time ago, had murdered a pedlar who possessed a large sum of money. He had passed the night at their house, and they, taking advantage of the heavy sleep that encompassed him, had strangled him, after which they placed his body in a chest. The chest was thrown into the well, and the well stopped up. Terrified by the deposition of his wife, the old man at length made a similar confession; and six weeks after the guilty couple expired on the scaffold.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

There is but one virtue, the eternal sacrifice of self.

Contentment gives a crown where fortune has denied it.

If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man.

Persistent people begin their success where others end in failure.

Prefer knowledge to wealth; for the one is transitory, the other perpetual.

Experience is a trophy composed of all the weapons we have been wounded with.

Happiness consists not in possessing much but in being content with what we possess.

A piece of steel is a good deal like a man; when you get it red hot it looses its temper.

God bless our women! To their soft hands and pitying hearts we must all come at last.

Unselfish people are always polite, because good manners are only the absence of selfishness.

Gold can buy nearly everything in this world except that which a man wants most —happiness.

The great thing in this world is not so much where we stand as in what direction we are moving.

When a strong brain is weighed with a true heart it seems like balancing a bubble against a wedge of gold.

Any man can pick up courage enough to be heroic for an hour; to be patiently heroic daily is the test of character.

When you fume and fret at the petty ills of life remember that the wheels which go round without creaking last longest.

Restraint and liberty go hand in hand in the development of character—indeed without the former the latter is impossible.

The work an unknown good man has done is like a vein of water flowing hidden underground, secretly making the ground green.

A word of kindness is seldom spoken in vain; while petty sayings are as easily lost as the pearls slipping from a broken string.

Reflect upon your present blessings, of which every man has many; not on your past misfortunes, of which all men have some.

Memory is a net. One may find it full of fish when he takes it from the brook, but a dozen miles of water have run through it without sticking.

The golden moments in the stream of life rush past us and we see nothing but sand; the angels come to visit us, and we only know them when they are gone.

True modesty is beautiful, but it announces the supremacy of the idea of perfection in mind, and at the same time, gives truth and sincerity the victory over force and vanity.

Let a man take time enough for the most trivial deed, though it be but the paring of his nails. The buds swell imperceptibly, without hurry or confusion, as if the short spring days were an eternity.

When God would educate a man He compels him to learn bitter lessons. He sends him to school to the necessities rather than to the graces, that, by knowing all suffering, he may know also the eternal consolation.

The sea drowns both ship and sailor, like a grain of dust, and we call it fate; but let him learn to swim, let him trim his bark, and the water which drowned him will be cloven by it, and will carry it like its own foam—a plume and a power.

Rumor is a pipe, blown by surmises, jealousies, conjectures; and of so easy and so plain a stop that the blunt monster, with uncounted heads—the still discordant wavering multitude—can play upon it.

That fortitude which has encountered no dangers, that prudence which has surmounted no difficulties, that integrity which has been attacked by no temptation, can best be considered but as gold not yet brought to the test, of which therefore the true value cannot be assigned.

Look Here.

Do you feel blue and despondent? Do pains rack and tear away at nerve and muscle, and have you been disappointed in finding a remedy that will afford certain and speedy relief? If so, go at once to any drug store and buy a sample bottle of Polson's Nerviline. Polson's Nerviline never fails to relieve neuralgia, cramps, headache, rheumatism and all internal or external pains. J. B. Cartman, druggist, Morrisburgh, writes: "All the parties I supply speak very favorably of Nerviline, and always purchase a second lot." Polson's Nerviline is sold in sample bottles at 10 cents; large size 25 cents—by all druggists and country dealers everywhere. Try a ten cent bottle.

A man named Songster shot another man in Philadelphia last week. He sings in another key now—turn-key.

Not another Pill shall go down my throat again, said a citizen "when I can get such a prompt and pleasant cure for my Bilious attacks, such as Dr. Carson's Stomach Bitters. It renders the Blood Pure and Cool and makes a splendid Spring Medicine. Large bottles 50 cents

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern medicine has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of Catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

Is Advice Cheap?

We think not, for if disinterested it has like every good thing, been dearly purchased. A fool may offer, but it requires a wise man to profit by it, and you, my reader, may offer or accept a little practical advice. Use or tell your friends to use only Putnam's Corn Extractor, for thousands have testified, after a practical test, that it is the only sure, safe and harmless remedy for corns in the world. Sold everywhere, by druggists and dealers in medicine, all over the country. Beware of substitutes.

It is said that glue is used in the cheaper grades of ice cream. That is ice cream "with a stick in it."

CONBOY'S CARRIAGE TOPS

is one of the hits. Not that a carriage top is anything new, but the great want of something more perfect than the heavy, expensive, inconvenient tops in use, suggested the invention of the Conboy Adjustable Top, which has been altered and improved until it now stands without a rival. The styles and grades now manufactured are the most popular, and are varied enough to suit all tastes. Mr. Conboy is the Pioneer in this business. It has been his aim since the commencement to merit the patronage and confidence of the trade and the public, by producing durable and convenient, and at the same time, elegant and stylish tops, that could be sold at exceedingly low prices. That this end has been attained is abundantly proved by the thousands sold, and the numerous letters of approval received from the leading carriage builders throughout the country. Since moving to Toronto, Mr. Conboy is giving his whole attention to the improvement and manufacture of carriage tops, where his increased facilities, his practical knowledge, and his numerous patented improvements, give him great advantages over all competitors.

SAW MILL AND TIMBER LAND FOR SALE OR TO LET

In the Township of Artemesia, County of Grey, 4 miles from Flesherton Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The mill is situated at Little Falls, in a block of about 400 acres timber and, with other timber land surrounding. The building is substantially built on stone foundation. The machinery is all good and driven with great power by a 23 inch Leffell wheel, under 36 ft. head of water. There are one large circular saw for cutting logs, 2 small circulars for sawing lath and broom handles, 1 guage lathe for turning broom handles, etc., 1 shingle machine with jointer and packer complete. The water power is excellent, the stream being very regular. There are several other good mill sites on the proyerty. The land in valley is considered the best in the country. The place would make an excellent stock farm when the timber is taken off.

This offers a good opportunity for a practical, energetic man to go into this kind of business, as the place will be sold or let on liberal terms.

The bush is so convenient to the mill logs can be trucked in summer time. Immediate possession given.

The Rotten Egg Episode.

WALKERTON, July 24.—At a largely attended meeting of the members of the Methodist church held last night the following resolution was carried by a standing vote, every one of the 104 persons present voting in favor: Resolved, that we the members and adherents of the Methodist church in the town of Walkerton, after hearing the explanations of our minister, are in perfect accord with the Magistrate's court in exonerating him from all blame in connection with the disgraceful occurrence of Saturday last, and also that we assure him of our continued confidence in his integrity as a Christian minister and our pastor. The minister was rotten-egged by a woman who declared that he had slandered her.

Patrons of Husbandry.

Condensed report of semi-annual meeting of Grey Division Grange, held at Judsonville, July 8rd, 1884:

To the Worthy Master and Patrons of Grey Division Grange No. 2:

Your Committee on Stock beg to report as follows: That the Durhams or good Durham grades are the most profitable stock a farmer can raise as they come to maturity earlier than any other breed your committee are acquainted with, and to make farming with stock more profitable, more attention be paid to well-bred animals. Feeding from the beginning is indispensable, as we have the united testimony of all practical men, especially as regards cattle for beef. If a beast be matured at two years of age there is much more profit than by keeping till a greater age. We also consider it advisable for neighborhoods to co-operate as much as possible by going into one kind of stock. As regards dairying, your committee would not recommend any particular breed, as there is such a variety of opinions as regards that class of stock.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

GIDEON HARKNESS.

Moved by Bro G Harkness, seconded by Bro D Armstrong, that this report be adopted and engrossed on the minutes.—Passed.

To the Worthy Master and Patrons of Grey Division Grange:

Your committee on Implements beg leave to report as follows: Your committee believe that agriculturists to keep abreast of the times, must avail themselves of the best labor-saving implements procurable. Your committee would especially desire to draw the attention of patrons to self-binders, which being extensively manufactured and distributed, and believe that no farmer, farming two hundred acres or upwards, can afford to be without one. And where farms are small two or more ought to join together and get one, as with a little forethought one would cut 200 to 300 acres of grain, and all in good season. Your committee would not recommend any one make as being superior to any others, as there are several being nearly equally good, but would advise careful inspection before purchasing. Your committee would also desire to draw the attention of patrons to a new style of plow now before the public, called by some the "Jointer." It is made by different manufacturers, and is somewhat different in construction from the old style, it having a clear cut of from 12 to 14 inches with no appreciably extra draught, cleaning in all soils and in all circumstances, and doing about ¼ more work in a given length of time, it will also completely cover anything, covering the ground, such as stubble, manure, etc.

Moved by Bro Palmer, seconded by Bro Armstrong, that this report be received, adopted and engrossed on the minutes.—Passed.

EDUCATIONAL REPORT.

Your committee on Education are pleased to report an observable and increasing interest in this vital subject among our Granges and membership generally. The time has come when the farmer of our highly favored Dominion is becoming conscious of latent power of mind and what may be accomplished by him and for him through education. There is no reason certainly why we may not possess a clear, incisive intellect as well as our proverbial "Bone and sinew." Let us be as one man in our determination to regain our lost position in society, as leaders, and be content no longer to be led as lambs to the slaughter of our every interest and to be fed upon by the rapacious and wily in politics and business. Our common school system is not favorable to the farmer in proportion to his numerical interest and taxation. We should have less aim to produce teachers and more to fit our sons and daughters for honerable labor and an intelligent management of the home and farm. We should have less taxation by dropping off all that savors of sinecure in office or that which is indirect in taxation. Give us no local superintendent and compel us to raise no taxes to form funds for municipal grants. Let the Department cease to have more care to provide for the teacher's pleasure by multiplied privileges than to seek the interest of those taught and those who have to pay. Our aim in this report is merely suggestion, as of necessity required by keeping in view our duty to economize the valuable time of this Grange. But we hope by raising a few points in the limited space of this report, and any expression of this Grange thereon, if favorable, may draw the attention of higher Granges, that they may more fully formulate our wishes and set forth more clearly the incompleteness of our present system to meet our wants, so that their influence with the Departments of Education may result in freeing our system from what is not necessary, and in granting us in the text books used a proper and just consideration, not as members of a mere business that required little mind and much muscle, but the honorable and influential calling of agriculture that is now met on the markets of the world by a tide of competition that calls for thorough and indeed professional training to meet with success.

All of which we submit.

(Signed) H. D. IRWIN, Chairmam.
B. WHITE,
JOHN WEBER.

Moved by Bro Irwin, seconded by Bro Weber, that this report be received, adopted and engrossed in the minutes.

To the Worthy Master, Officers and Members of Grey Division Grange No. 2:

We, your committee on Temperance, beg leave to report that in view of the Scott Act being about to be submitted to the electors of this County, and from our opinion of the workings of the said Act in the counties in which it has been passed, your committee would recommend that this Division pledge their support in favor of said Act, and that the Secretary be required to furnish the leading papers in this County with a copy of this report.

J. I. GRAHAM, Chairman.

Moved by Bro J I Graham, seconded by Bro Wm McLoughry, that the above report be received and adopted.—Carried.

To the Members of Grey Diviston Grange:

We, your committee on Seed Grain, beg leave to report as follows: As fall wheat is the only seed grain that we have to notice at this season of the year, our labors will be light. The Clawson variety seems to be the most successful as yet, but your committee would suggest that if any member of this Grange has experimented with any other variety, that they report the result of their efforts to the Grange.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

MATHEW DENTON, Chairman.

Moved by Bro M Denton, seconded by Bro D Armstrong, that this report be adopted.—Carried.

REPORT ON HORTICULTURE.

To the Worthy Master and Members assemble in session Grey Division Grange:

Your committee regret to have to report the almost entire destruction of some of the best plum orchards in our district by blight, which struck the trees last August, the leaves and fruit withering and falling off, followed by a severe winter which killed the weakened trees. While some supposed this blight was caused by minute insects too small to be observed by the naked eye; others believe it to have been caused by overbearing: too much fruit being allowed to set on the trees. One thing is certain, namely, the Washington and General Hand (both varieties which never overbear) have come through unscathed by this blight. The McLaughlin, another shy bearer, has been very slightly affected. The Ontario, an excellent new variety, a regular annual bearer seems to be proof against the blight, and has this year its usual crop. The Lombard and Duanes Purple, our heaviest bearers, have suffered more than any other variety. Ordinary blue plums stood the blight, but are fast dying out with black knot. Your committee desire to impress on our members the great importance of planting more small fruit, at least in sufficient quantities to supply every and all patrons homes. The strawberry in its season, followed by the raspberry, and in its turn, again followed by the Black Cap and Blackberry, the Grape, the Currant and the Gooseberry. We are pleased to know that the old days of pork and potatoes for breakfast, potatoes and pork for dinner, pork and potatoes for supper, are past and a new era is approaching when more delicious ripe fruit is being used in the household. Our small fruits are so easily canned and dried that there is no reason why there should not be fruit on the table of every patron the year round. Your committee are deeply impressed with the fact that at no distant day there will be an outlet to Europe by Hudson's Bay, bringing the North-West farmer many, many miles nearer Europe than we are, thus giving them the advantage in Europerian markets, over us in grain and cattle, but with our improved facilities for shipment and rapid transportation there is no reason why our division may not for the present generation at least supply our fellow subjects in the North-West with large quantities of fruit. And your committee can only reiterate the sentiment conveyed in a former report, namely, that one or more co-operative canning and drying factories in our division, would be, in our estimation, a profitable enterprise: profitable to the owners and profitable to the fruit growers. To be successful in fruit growing, eternal care and viligance are required. A wise selection of varieties and good cultivation, while we have many new varieties which promise great things to fruit growers, yet it is not wise to discard the old tried varieties, at least, not very many of them. Your committee have to report favorably of the wealthy Pewankie and American Pippin apples being perfectly hardy, long keepers and early bearers, and are of opinion they should be planted more largely than at present. For situations on the shores of Georgian Bay the fine old Baldwins and Rhode Island Greenings will succeed tolerably well if grafted in the limbs while they are tender on their own stocks. For Melancthon, Proton and other sections of our division, no apple will give better satisfaction than the Rambo, which is found in those townships thriving even when neglected in beaver meadows and low, wet, undrained situations where no other variety will succeed. Your committee desire to draw your attention to the fact that Pears on suitable soil and under careful cultivation succeeds admirably in our division; we may mention the Flemish Beauty, Bartlett, Deerborns Seedling, Duchess De-Angouleme and Vicar of Wakefield as amongst the most hardy and profitable. A stiff clay soil, well drained, is the home of the Pear, and the stiffer the clay the greater the success, provided it is thoroughly drained and subsoiled. The careful fruit grower who cultivates the orchard, will succeed, provided he plants varieties suitable for his soil, while the careless cultivator will be met with disappointment continually.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Prominent among the greatest medical discoveries, by the many cures it has effected, McGregor's Speedy Cure leads the van. Subjected to the minutest chemical analysis, it has been found to contain none of those injurious ingredients, characterizing the worthless specifics daily offered to the public. Every ingredient possesses a peculiar adaptability to the various complaints for which it has been compounded, and its efficacy is being established by testimonials hourly received. We are therefore confident that we have a preparation which we can offer to the public with the assurance that it will be found not only a relief but an absolute cure for Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Indigestion, Constipation and Impure Blood. CHAPTER IX.—CONTINUED.

The last of the magisterial examinations was over now, and so far as it lay in the power of the inferior tribunal to pass judgment, Frank was found guilty. It had been impossible indeed to come to any other decision in the circumstances, for the evidence was overwhelmingly strong. The nurse, finding it impossible to retract the story first told, swore with every appearance of sincerity—and she honestly believed that in the spirit, if not the letter, she spoke the absolute truth—that she had relinquished her charge into Mr. de Walden's hands, that they two had gone out together, that Mr. de Walden had never returned, while the child was found murdered in the shrubbery, strangled by the sash she had tied around his waist.

The woman broke down in a tempest of hysterical tears when she spoke the last words, and a thrill of indignant sympathy ran through the crowded court. But the sensation she produced was as nothing compared with that which thrilled all hearts when Sir George de Walden stepped heavily into the witness-box, and, clutching at the chair-back, as though to steady himself, began in hoarse vibrating tones to tell his tale.

He dwelt on on every circumstance that could connect his nephew with the crime with a sort of malignant intensity. By sheer force of will he seemed to bear it upon his hearers his own conviction of his nephew's guilt. Men and women who had doubted before felt their doubts borne away upon the strong current of that deliberate yet passionate speech: eyes that had rested almost compassionately on the worn, proud, young face turned from it with loathing then. Even the good looks, the air of trained and graceful strength that would have told in the prisoner's favor in any other circumstances, seemed an argument against him with the women listeners now, for all remembered that that young strength had been pitted against the weakness of a child. But of all the fierce feeling wakening against him Frank knew nothing; he hardly listened to the words, his eyes rested with such pitying earnestness on the old man's altered face. Sir George de Walden, when he saw him last, had borne his sixty odd years with so gallant a grace that few strangers would have thought him more than fifty. Now the upright figure was bowed, the gray head white as snow; the eyes red-rimmed and sunken far back into their sockets, seemed the only signs of life in a dead face, and they betokened only pain and hate.

While giving his evidence Sir George stared straight before him, as though measuring the weight of every word he spoke upon the magisterial mind; but, just as he left the box, he glanced over in his nephews direction, met fully the passionate pleading glance of the pitiful gray eyes, and drew back as though the other had offered to touch him.

"I call on you all to witness," he cried, with a fiery outburst as unexpected as it was irrepressible, "that but one man had an interest in my child's death, and I say that that man killed him!"

Of course the tumult caused by these words was immediate repressed, and the witness reminded that he must offer evidence only; but the witness was gone, and there remained only the impression left by his words. People whispered to each other that the prisoner grew deadly white, and that, for the first time that day, the muscles twitched with a sort of nervous distress; but he lifted his head almost immediately and glanced round the court, not defiantly, but with quiet steadfast pride.

Since then he had seen nothing of his uncle, though he had heard indirectly that he still pursued him with an unrelenting hate, still believed firmly in his guilt; but it was a subject that he could discuss only with his solicitor, for Lord Croxford, on whom that one interview had made a cruelly strong impression, evidently shirked it, and when Essie and May were with him other matters filled his thoughts.

He welcomed the girls with eager gladness now; the time in which they would be free to visit him was growing pitifully short. His trial was fixed for the tenth of October—ten days from the present time, and after that—He never dared carry his thoughts much beyond that time; he should either be free, saved by a miracle from the net that had enmeshed him, or——

He lifted the pale brave little face between his hands and gazed upon it with a fondly critical gaze, noting the violet tinge beneath the steadfast eyes, the fine lines about the sweet sensitive mouth,

"Still brave and hopeful, Essie?" he asked, in a half whisper; and Essie answered aloud—

"Not only hopeful but sure. No, do not shake your head, dear; I have not one doubt. Heaven knows your innocence, and Heaven will prove it in time."

There was all the calmness of assured conviction in her sweet unfaltering tones. She spoke as a person speaks from knowledge, not from faith. In spite of himself and his reason, Frank felt a faint thrill of hope, and May turned round from the window with a little sob.

"She always talks like that. She never seems to waver. The child is either inspired or mad! But I am neither. And, oh, Frank, my dear, dear boy, do not trust in your innocence, or in any miracle; but try to think of some one who would, or could, be demon enough to kill that poor little child!"

Frank laid his hand on the girl's graceful shoulder with a touch that was in itself a caress.

"Poor May!" he said gently. "You must not cry your pretty eyes out, or break your kind heart for me; that would be treating Croxford badly. By-the-way, where is that loyal friend to-day?"

"He was to have met us here," May answered, drying the eyes he apostrophised with vengeful little dabs, and speaking with all the petulance of pain. "But he is long past his time; perhaps he too has turned traitor and deserted us; nothing would surprise me now."

"I think that would," Frank said, with his gentle tired smile. "Hark, May! There is a commentary on your injustice; I hear his step and voice in the corridor."

Almost before the words had passed his lips, Lord Croxford was in the room, and at the first sight of his face May jumped up with a shrill little scream, and Essie clasped her hands on Frank de Walden's arm, as though supporting him against some sudden shock.

For the young Viscount was literally radiant; his sallow skin was flushed, his gold glasses shone like lamps, his lips quivered with the vain effort to surpress a happy smile.

"Oh, Croxford, you have news—good news!" May cried with passionate eagerness, "Tell it quickly. We can bear any shock of joy."

"Yes, good news, and a visitor," Croxford answered, clasping his sweet-heart's hand, but looking at the prisoner's pale proud face. "Frank, dear old fellow, prepare yourself to see Sir George de Walden."

The name seemed to strike Frank like a blow; the blood rushed hotly to his face, then ran back, leaving it very pale, as his uncle's face, filled with malignant hatred, rose before him, his uncles harsh denunciatory tones rang once more in his ears.

"He could come on but one errand," Essie cried, her blue eyes radiant with that unshaken light of faith, but with something of the old sweet serenity vanished from her face, "Oh, Frank, you will see him, dear."

But Lord Croxford had not waited for the answer; he had gone back to the door, and now returned, leading in Sir George de Walden.

For one moment the young man stood proudly irresolute, for one moment the old man stood, with bent head and cruelly working face, before the nephew he had wronged and hated. It seemed as though neither know how to break the eloquent silence. At last, touched with an intense and aching pity for the crushed and broken man, Frank spoke,

"What am I to say, sir? Heaven knows how I pity you and grieve for your grief; but you—you think me the cause!"

"No, no!" The grave gentle tones seemed to break the spell that lay upon the old man's lips. He caught Frank's hand and clasped it between his own trembling palms, and poured forth his words now with a fevered volubility. "No, I was mad to doubt you, Frank; and now at last I know——

"Know he is innocent!" Essie cried, raising her small head proudly. "We knew it always, sir."

"And I only to-day." Sir George paused and passed his handkerchief across the wrinkled forehead on which the great drops were gathering thick and fast, then turned to his nephew with a painfully forced smile. "Frank, if the tardy penitence I offer is worthless besides the faith of these true friends, I bring something that will make amends, something that will give you life and freedom and take the last stigma from your name."

"And that is——" May broke in breathlessly, for Frank was past all speech.

"The murderer's confession, sent to me by the priest and magistrate to whom he dictated it on his death-bed. He was—he was" Sir George paused again, seeming to gather all his strength to utter the words that tried him so sorely—"the man we all thought dead, my wife's discarded lover—Giuseppe Lani!"

CHAPTER X.

"Well," said Lord Croxford, puffing vigorously at his cigar, and beaming on his friend complacently, "now that all is well with you again, I do not mind confessing that I was horribly afraid; things looked awfully black for you this time last week, Frank."

Frank nodded.

"But you never lost faith in me," he said gratefully.

"In you? Well, no; I was not quite such an ass; but my faith in your lucky star was getting decidedly shaky. Certainly I never dreamed that your uncle would be the man to come forward and prove your innocence."

"My poor uncle! I really do not understand how the whole thing came about now. Do not stare, Croxford; I know of course that I am free, and that that fellow Lani was the murderer; but there my knowledge really ends."

"But the whole story has been printed in every newspaper in the kingdom," Lord Croxford persisted in much amazement. Frank winced, and turned away as he answered beneath his breath—

"I have not cared to read the papers lately."

"No, no, of course not," returned the good-natured young Viscount, with ready comprehension of the other's feelings and ready regret for his own blundering speech. "Look here, old fellow! Can you endure to hear the story? I will tell it as briefly as may be."

"Yes, tell me please," Frank answered eagerly; and, after a few preliminary puffs at his cigar, Croxford continued—

"You see this Italian was poor Lady de Walden's cousin, and appears to have looked upon her as his own special property, ever since she was a child; not that she gave him any encouragement, for she held him in extreme dread, but perhaps he thought to subjugate her by that very fear. They tell me she was very beautiful——"

"She was," Frank broke in with a low pained tone, "the loveliest girl I ever saw, and her beauty was of the purest, most angelic type."

"Well, poor soul, she ought to be an angel in Heaven now, for she died the death of a martyr here; but to go back to the days before her marriage. It seemed this Lani tried to force from her a promise to wait three years for him, and marry him on his return from the voyage on which he confidently hoped to make his fortune; and she——"

"Refused him and married my uncle. I heard that part of the story."

"Oh, have you! Well, having heard nothing of her terrible cousin for so long a time. I suppose poor Lady de Walden came to the comfortable conclusion that he was dead; and I do not think that Sir George ever troubled himself about the matter; but it so happened that Lani returned to Port Rico on the very day that your uncle went back to England. The news that met the fiery-tempered desperado, whom success had rendered more arrogant and imperious than ever, drove him absolutely mad. Anita's refusal had counted for absolutely nothing in his thoughts, though he had fiercely resented it at the time. He had returned rich; he did not doubt that he should find her still at Port Rico, and could cajole or force her into marrying him at last. When he did find that she was already married, that she, her child and husband had escaped him but by a day, his rage was terrible to behold. He followed instantly to England, driven on, as he told the priest who shrived him, by a keen desire for revenge. All one day and night he hid about the park, hoping to catch sight of Lady de Walden; but she never left the house, though he saw you constantly with the poor little child by your side."

Frank's face grew very pale; and he turned his head abruptly away, recalling, with a keen pang, the little trotting figure by his side, and thinking of the lurking murderer so near at hand.

"He did not think at first of harming Georgie. But the next morning, rendered desperate by fatigue and baffled rage, he ventured nearer to the house. The little fellow, who was seated on the verandah waiting, as it seems, for you, caught sight of the lurking figure, and ran out to it with a glad greeting cry of 'Cousin Frank, cousin Frank!' Lani caught and held him in a grip of iron, and the poor baby soon discovered his mistake. He began to whimper as he looked into the hard cruel eyes of his captor, and then, and not till then,—or so he says—there came to the murderer the fiendish thought that he could best punish and torture the mother through the child."

"And he killed him!" Frank cried, lifting his ashen face and blazing eyes with a look of dazed horror—"killed the innocent trusting little creature that even a wild beast might have spared!"

"Such men are worse than wild beasts," Croxford answered sadly. His honest face was pale with sympathetic pain; but he hurried through the hard task he had set himself. "And his cruel vengeance did not end there. He waited in the shrubbery until Lady de Walden came, and then rose up like a demon before her, and, overwhelming the pale mother with fierce reproaches, flung the dead child at her feet."

"You know the rest, Frank," Lord Croxford went on, after a brief pause, broken by the other's choking sobs. "The shock turned the poor young mother's brain, broke her heart—and—killed her with merciful swiftness. Lani, with an audacity that seems almost incredible, went straight back to Port Rico, where he led for some weeks a life of reckless dissipation, and was finally killed in a drunken brawl, lingering, thank Heaven, just long enough to clear and save you."

Lord Croxford leaned back in his chair and resumed his cigar with a relieved sigh, watching his friend keenly the while through his half-closed eyes. A week's freedom had not served to restore Frank de Walden the nerve and strength of which the long imprisonment and longer strain of suspense had robbed him. He looked pale and harassed, and started at every unexpected sound in a way that would have seemed absurd to the hale athletic young fellow of a few months back.

"There is but one cure for him, complete change of scene and thought, and but one travelling companion who will serve to rouse him," the kindly young man decided within himself. "I will talk to Sir George to-morrow; he must see that Frank has been sacrificed long and cruelly enough, even to such a sorrow as his."

He carried out his intention; and, as Sir George had taken the strong capricious fancy of an invalid to May Verner's lover, much was decided at the conference between them and Frank was not a little astonished by a summons to his uncle's presence.

He obeyed it with a sort of languid distaste—not that he harboured one bitter or resentful thought against the man who had done his best to hang him; but he shrank always and nervously from any painful scene, from any expression of remorse or regret, from any touching upon the unhealed, aching wound in his memory and thoughts.

It was an inexpressible relief and almost as much of a surprise to him to see May Verner's bright face behind the sick man's chair, to see the eager pleading smile with which his uncle held out one thin hand to greet him.

"At last, Frank!" he cried, trying to keep the faint touch of reproach out of his tone. "I thought you were never coming near me again."

Frank muttered some few words of apology in a dull mechanical fashion, and dropped listlessly into the nearest chair. He did not mean to be ungracious, and was dimly conscious of May's reproachful look; but even to please her he could not shake off that cruel apathy that lay so heavily upon him.

"Well, I cannot grumble," Sir George said, with a short, impatient sigh; "but I am glad you have come, for I want to speak to you—on business."

"On business?" Frank repeated, with a stupid stare. What business could have any interest for this desolate, stricken old man?

Sir George read the not unnatural thought, and slightly shook his snow-white head.

"I have still to set my house in order, Frank; but the business of which I spoke was yours. My dear boy, I have never spoken of the cruel wrong I did you."

"Do not!" Frank said with a sharp little wince and an imploring gesture. "I want to forget."

"And, to show that you forgive, will you—will you——" Sir George suddenly caught his nephew's hand and held it fast, then turned his head back, and said hurriedly to the watchful girl behind his chair—"May, tell him what I want."

May flushed a little, but answered instantly to Frank's appealing look.

"Sir George thinks, and we all agree, Frank, that you and Essie should get married at once."

It was a verbal thunderbolt. Frank rose at once, the red blood dyeing his pale face, the pained and listless look yielding to one of half rapturous, half shocked astonishment.

"At once—in all this——" He paused and glanced at Sir George, who promptly took the word from him.

"In all this misery? Yes; it is my wish—my earnest eager wish, Frank. You will not deny that pleasure to a man who has no other left in the world? Marry, and take your wife away, and let me see you happy and yourself again before I die."

Frank paced the little room with hasty uneven steps; his nerves tingled with the excitement of the thought, his blood ran wildly through his veins, the old listless apathy was dead, and in its place there had come a feverish unrest.

To win Essie, his true and loyal love, to bear her away with him, to forget for a while beneath bluer skies and in softer airs the misery that had almost turned his brain and broken the spring of life within him—this was a temptation indeed; and yet—and yet —— Would not the burial and the bridal services jar discordantly? Dare he be happy in presence of this fresh grief—these new-made graves?

Perhaps May, who knew and loved, and who was watching him intently, divined the morbid thought, for she whispered gently as he neared her chair—

"Remember, Frank, he is the truest mourner—and it is his wish!"

"And—Mr. Verner?"

May's whole face brightened, for these few words told her that the day was won.

"Papa will be overjoyed. He and Sir George and Croxford arranged it all between them last night."

"And Essie?"

May's gold-flecked lashes rested for a moment on her soft pink cheek, then lifted themselves bravely, as she said, with a frankly affectionate smile—

"Ask her, Frank. Even her lover must not answer such a question as that."

* * * * *

Frank did ask her, with all the eloquence at his command; and without any show of doubt or hesitation Essie placed her small hand in his, and agreed at once to his wish. It was no time for coyness or coquetry, when her lover's life almost seemed at stake, and there was no reason for delay when millinery preparations were unnecessary. So, one week later, Esther Verner and Frank de Walden were made one in the quietest fashion, and the great wish of Sir George de Walden's heart was fulfilled.

"I can die happy now!" he said to May, his great comfort and consoler, when the wedding was over, and the young pair had started on their honey moon trip; and May only answered with her cheerily obstinate look—

"No; you have made them happy; you must live to see—who knows?—perhaps to share—their happiness now."

Sir George smiled affectionately at the girl and sadly at the prophecy; but, strange to say, the latter was fulfilled. He did live to welcome Frank back, restored to perfect health of mind and body, and, being nursed with tenderest devotion by the new mistress of De Walden Court, even seemed to take a fresh hold in life. Grand-nephew and grand-niece had climbed about his knees and taught him that life holds drops of sweetness to the very dregs, before the end came, and he looked his last on loving faces before they laid him to rest beside the young wife and little child of whom a cruel vengeance had robbed him.

THE END.

AMERICAN FABLES.

HOW THE WOLF GOT LEFT.

A Fox who had been caught in a trap appealed to a passing Wolf to save his Life, and vowed that his Gratitude would never grow cold. The Wolf helped him out and was overwhelmed with Thanks as the Fox limped away. After a few days the Wolf wanted Assistance in securing one of a flock of fat sheep, and he called upon the Fox to go with him.

"Too dangerous," replied Reynard.

"Then help me to catch a goat."

"Too much running."

"You will at least render me assistance in digging out a couple of Hares for my Sunday dinner?" continued the Wolf.

"But I am a Friend of the Hares," answered Reynard.

"See here!" exclaimed the Wolf, "I rendered you a Great Service and counted on your Gratitude. Is this the way you repay me?"

"My Friend," said Reynard, as he scratched a flea off his shoulder, "there's a heap of difference between a Fox in a Trap and a Fox at liberty. Please go away—you make me tired."

MORAL:

The man who doesn't happen to meet you when he wants a favor continues your friend.

THE TIGER'S FRIENDSHIP.

A Tiger one day approached a Peasant near enough to call out that he wanted to be friends, and to invite the man to meet him half-way.

"Tigers have always eaten men, and men have always sought to kill tigers," he added, "but I can see no reason why it should be so."

"Nor I, either," answered the Peasant, and he advanced to the meeting.

They were yet several feet apart when the Tiger called out:

"Ha! why do you bring a gun with you?"

"And why are you licking your chops and working your claws?" shouted the Peasant.

The result was that the Tiger skulked back to the thicket and the Peasant to his field, each feeling renewed distrust.

MORAL:

In some cases Fear is a great safeguard against Friendship.

THE FOOLISH PEASANT.

A Peasant who was Being Pursued by a Wolf managed to Escape by Climbing a Tree. The panting Wolf looked up at him and called out:

"How contemptible in you to take advantage of my inability to climb trees! If there was any man about you would give me a fair show!"

"But you intended to Eat me!" Protested the man.

"Suppose I did. Wasn't I willing to give you the same chance! Come down and be a man!"

Thus appealed to the Peasant descended and the Wolf made short work of him.

MORAL:

When you get ahead of a faro bank put the money into real estate.

Concerning Enemies.

One real good first class enemy is worth more to a man or woman than a dozen tender-footed friends. The individual who does anything in this world is bound to have opposition, more or less bitter, and it may be set down as an infallible rule, that he who has only friends never does enough good to be good, or enough bad to be bad. He is a negative quantity which has trivial extension and nothing more. He displaces as much atmosphere as a man of equal size, but the analogy ends there. Bad enemies, malicious people, I mean, are to be feared for they are the worst kinds of thieves. They steal reputation, and reputation is something they have no use for themselves nor can they transfer it to anyone else. Even that kind of enemy has his usefulness though, for his enmity is so much more of a compliment than his friendship, that respectable people admire, more than ever, the object of his abuse and spite. The devil is the arch enemy and he does great mischief, but we have to have him, for if there were no devil there would be no divinity, and the world would be a great mass of namby pambyism, so utterly insipid that men would invent sin to give life a little tone and spice and make it endurable. Enmity gives form and substance to friendship and true friendship is the crown of human association.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary announcement has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of Catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is a result not five per cent. of the patients pronounced themselves to the regular practitioner benefitted, while the patent medicine and other advertised cures never reared a case. All. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the cure is practically cured, and the permanency of the cures effected by him for years ago are cures still. No one else has ever tempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

Upon digging down a few inches it appeared clean and white. He concluded that the red dust must have been meteoric in, and in some way connected with the unusual protracted sunsets. Prof. Van Diest of Denver disposes of this theory very briefly. "It could not have been meteoric [illegible] specific gravity have sunk beneath the surface of the snow, and, in addition to this, the color would not have been red, as it is described to have been, but it would have been more like ochre. I imagine that the red substance found upon the snow was the pollen of some flower which had been carried from a distance by the winds. This has been noticed before, travellers in the Arctic regions have spoken of seeing similar appearances upon the snow. Examinations have shown it to be vegetable and not material."

How the Italians Welcome Travellers from France—A Lady's Narrative of Her Experience.

On Monday we slept in Paris; and having the following evening paid our reckoning and packed ourselves and luggage off to the Lyons Railway Station, we prepared to depart by the seven o'clock night express. But lo! when taking our tickets to be stamped at the quichet, our attention was attracted to a notice in front of our eyes, which we were told had only that morning been issued, to the effect that all people travelling to Italy, via Modane, through France, would be subject to a five days' quarantine on the frontier. About nine o'clock next day we reached Modane, where we all alight, for the examination of our luggage by the Italian douaniers. And now begin our troubles. We have to show our tickets one by one to a jolly, good-looking man—a gentleman in plain clothes—who bars our passage beyond the platform. We are almost the first to approach. He takes our tickets, makes much pretence of examining them, and with a bland smile

COOLLY PRONOUNCES OUR DOOM,

"Cinq jours de quarantine a Bardonneche!" We protest. We insist that we only left London on Monday, and slept but one night in a clean hotel in Paris; that we have no option but to push on, as "Monsieur" has an engagement at —— for Sunday; that we have travelled all night, and have no right to be thus detained. The man is inflexible, and declares that if we have only "touches a Paris" to Bardonnecchia we must go to be disinfected, for five days. At length some carriages are shunted up and we are told to enter a first-class compartment. The smell of carbolic powder greatly distresses our empty stomachs. At last we are off, and are at once in darkness, for we are in the Mount Cenis Tunnel. Arrived at the other end, whence our train has barely emerged, the doors are opened and we are ordered to dismount. "Where are the omnibuses?" I ask, in grim jest. Persons in uniform takes possession of us all—for there are "pestiferes" in other carriages—and we are marched in the full blaze of a mid-day sun on to the mountain-side, retracing for about the space of twenty minutes the way we have just passed. There are many white tents dotted about the plain. These, we are given to understand, are for the soldiers, by whom we are guarded on every hand. At length we come to a standstill, and want to know what the next proceeding is to be. With shoulder shrugs we are told that there is nothing more to be said. Here we are, enfin, camped out, and must make the best of it. No sign of any refreshment, and no luggage. This last has gone to the railway station. "Will it be sent to us?" "In time, but it must first be purified." "But will our boxes be opened?" "Decidedly; your keys would be asked for by-and bye, but not yet;

WE MUST HAVE PATIENCE."

"But surely we shall be present at the inspection and purification?" "That is not possible, since the luggage is at the station and you are not allowed to leave these boundaries" Oh, horror! to have our boxes unpacked by these men; our pretty toilettes subjected to any process of fumigation they may choose to apply; ribbons discolored, Parisian flowers mauled, hats and bonnets spoiled. We were all gasping for a wash and some refreshment, and both seemed as far beyond our reach as did Turin itself. Besides which, say what they might, the manner of those who promised us the eventual transfer of our effects was far from reassuring; and when I pleaded for the prompt possession of my linen, of which I stood in pressing need—having not a single garment with me to change for the dusty, travel-stained clothes I wore—I received for sole reply, "Ce ne'est que pour cinq jours!" Qu'est-ce que cela fait? cinq jours!" I really began to think I must be a sybarite, and had asked for some extraordinary luxury. But here we were under a burning sun, with no kind of shelter; a gloomy-looking garret was in view, but men were intercepting us from its approach by a length of wire. Having nothing else to do, tired and utterly worn out, suffering from a horrible headache, and feeling deadly sick with the odor of disinfectants that poisoned the very air we breathed, I sat down on the parched grass and cried! This undignified proceeding secured me some attention. Job's comforters flocked round me with the reassuring phrase "It's only for five days." "For God's sake," said I entreatingly to the medico, "conduct me to some shade for my head is splitting!" I rose and followed him, accompanied by all our party. We entered the caserine, and were shown the place where we might stay and sleep Bare stone walls, filthy floor with black patches of grime upon its surface, no table, no chair, no bench, no straw, Here we are all to herd ourselves to night in a concentrated essence of carbolic. Indignantly we protest, and are answered, "Mais c'est une belle piece; que voulez vous? Ce n'est que pour cinq jours!" In another similar apartment are three filthy sacks filled with dirty straw and two iron bedsteads. Whoever wants these luxuries, I suspect, will have a good price to pay. There are doorways but no doors. Our companions may be refugees from the plague-stricken towns; the riff-raff that haunts our place of quarantine may murder and rob us in the night for aught we know. "You have your remedy," said the doctor, "you can return to France." "How soon?" we exclaim in a breath. "There is a train that returns to Modane at five o'clock." Five o'clock, and it was now only half past twelve. "We will go, then, but must leave this place at once." So the [illegible] calls a soldier, writes on a piece of paper our permission to pass, and hands it to him, with an order to conduct us to the station at Bardonnecchia.—London News.

In a Greek Family.

We alighted from our mules in front of the cafe and then ascended a dark wooden staircase to be introduced to our host and hostess. The latter was a stout busy woman, scantily clad, without shoes or stockings; she had on a white cotton skirt, while over this was a blue jacket, ganged behind and frilled at the edge. She had on a white head dress twisted in folds, and a streamer hanging down behind. Her name was Mrs. Sunday. She had large brown pencilled eyebrows, a sallow, almost swarthy, complexion, and a profile as Grecian as ever was seen on any vase. She greeted us with profusion, apologizing, as women will, for her negligé attire, and busied herself to prepare for our reception. * * * * * * *

After a few minutes our host and a few friends dropped in He was a regular islander, with his baggy trousers, his loose embroidered waistcoat, and his fez. He carried a gourd in his hand full of wine, some of which he spilt as a libation, just as if he were an ancient Greek who wished to propitiate Zeus. Then we all raised the gourd to our lips in turn, saying, "We have found you well," and other compliments, which flow like water in these parts. Our host expressed his delight at the honor we had done him by visiting his roof, and told us that a table should be spread for us later on, after which he would have the pleasure of questioning us about our wanderings. . . . .

It was quite dark before the table was spread for our meal, and when served it was more curious than sumptuous; the water, in which a kid had been boiled with some rice in it, led the way as soup, and was followed by pickled cuttle fish, very hard and unpalatable, but a prized luxury in these islands, especially during Lent, so much so that it would pay the enterprise of pickling the many thousands we throw away in disgust to send out here. Then came the kid, a deliciously tender little thing, one of a litter of six, our host informed us. After the kid came the misethra, a standard dish in the Grecian Islands, made of curdled milk. I have tasted exactly the same in Corsica, under the name of broccio, and I always revel in it. There was a Turkish dish of rice and sour milk, called pilaff and yaourte, and which I had considerable difficulty in getting rid of; figs and almonds brought the repast to a close. The wine was rich and excessively sweet, such as, I presume, once was the nectar of the gods. The table was laid for four, ourselves, our host and his brother. Mrs. Sunday and her family waited upon us; occasionally she sat down respectfully in a corner, with a bone which she gnawed: but when all was cleared away, and the men began to smoke, she drew her chair up to the table, took occasional sips out of her husband's glass, and became talkative. Now all restraint was at an end, and questions about England and the far west occupied more time than I cared to devote to them. Every Greek adores the name of Mr. Gladstone, and I went up considerably in our host's estimation when I told him I had been at Oxford. "Then you are a schoolfellow of Mr. Gladstone's?" To this novel way of looking at the question I deemed it wise to assent.
